what the Republican Party has done and what the Democratic Party has done for agriculture. The Democratic Party has proceeded to relieve the farmer on farm implements. The impression has been all over the country that many of these articles from which the Democratic Party has removed the tariff were revenue articles. That is a wrong impression. These implements have been sold in foreign countries—made in the United States—cheaper than they could be bought right here at our door. Take barb wire, for instance. Barb wire is an expensive article, used on the farm, and the farmers must have this wire. The farmers in Europe buy the American barb wire cheaper than the American farmer. The Republican Party can not hide behind the old cry of "The Government must raise revenue," because barb wire produces no revenue. It is excluded. The same is true of nearly all the other farm implements, or any other article that is excluded from this country by the tariff wall. I will say to the gentleman, the facts are against your party. Your protective tariff system was never intended to help the farmer. It was inaugurated to help the manufacturers; now it has become the citadel of trusts, and this talk of protective tariff for farmers is nothing less than a Republican snare and deception to try to deceive the farmer; but you can not deceive him with that argument.

The policy of protection has been to place high duty on the things the farmer is forced to buy and give the protected interest a lever to fluctuate the price of farm products at will. How can the farmer receive his well-earned profits at the end of the year if he is forced by the trusts, through the protective-tariff system, to pay trust prices for the necessary demands to make his crop and furnish his family with the necessaries of life? He pays trust prices for farm implements, personal effects, commercial fertilizers, and almost everything not produced on the farm. He pays his tribute to the trusts, his arch enemy, almost every time he makes a purchase. Tell me I should not cry out against such discrimination! You only add to my zeal and determination to help, if possible, that class of our Commonwealth. The farmers' free list places nearly all farm implements free of duty, and this takes almost no revenue from the Government, the whole amount of revenue raised from agricultural implements for the year 1910 being only $12,189. Another strong illustration of discrimination against the farmer is cotton bagging and ties. The country has been misled with the doctrine that bagging and ties are revenue-producing articles. As a matter of truth the combined duty does not reach $100,000 annually. Thus you see all farm implements, bagging and ties, and various other articles I could enumerate now in the free list do not produce enough revenue to be considered a drop in the bucket compared with the great amount of revenue to be raised. In passing, notice the discrimination. The western farmer wraps his hay with free twine, while cotton ties bear duty. So the country concludes that the farmer is discriminated against, and, furthermore, that blind prejudice has discriminated against the South in order that the protected industries might reap an unjust harvest from the toiling masses in every cotton district in the South. Another illustration in the present free list is the sewing machine, an article of common use in nearly every home in the land. The people in purchasing the sewing machine have paid a tribute of $5 to $10 on every machine to the trust, while the same trust sold foreigners American-made machines from $5 to $10 less than our citizens could buy them. It is unreasonable to suppose that when all the oppression of the Republican tariff is fully exposed and understood that this party of the trust can ever thrive again on the American continent, unless it adopts a different policy and ceases to discriminate against the poor of the land. It is a well-known fact that the trust is the favored child of the Republican Party, and now that we Democrats have control, let us set upon and destroy the power of the trust lest he turn again and rend us.

Mr. SLOAN. Speaking of the conditions of the last 16 years, what other profession or calling ever existed in this country that has increased in its wealth, both in volume and relatively more, than the farmers of the United States in spite of what has taken place?

Mr. TRIBBLE. In spite of the tariff that has been placed upon them and discriminations which have been made against them they have prospered. I will come to that just a little later.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Does the gentleman from Georgia think that the American farmer will be better off when he is buying imported implements made in foreign countries than when buying implements made at home?

Mr. TRIBBLE. We do not have to buy imported implements when we can get them here at reasonable prices with protection removed. We should get them at the same price the foreigner gets them. Certainly American-produced articles should not be sold in foreign countries for less money that our farmers pay for the same articles.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Was not the object of the Democratic Party in reducing the tariff to enable the farmer to get imported implements?

Mr. TRIBBLE. No, sir; you would not give your farmers at your door an opportunity to buy a plow that he used every day at the same price sold to foreigners, and yet it was made at your door, and still you ask that farmers support you. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I would not criticize the majority of the committee in forming tariff bills for the consideration of this House; they are Democrats of many years experience in tariff investigations and legislation; but I regret that in their wisdom they are not prepared to give the country reduction on certain other articles of necessity at the present time. For instance, from all over the country comes the appeal for reduction of the tariff on sugar. In justice to the committee, however, it is right that the attention of the country be called to the fact that nearly $60,000,000 of revenue tax is raised annually from this source. The country is assured by the committee that not only sugar, but hundreds of other articles will be revised downward as soon as luxuries can be supplied in a business way to take the place of sugar and other revenue-producing articles.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Those schedules will be considered and acted upon in the regular order as they come up before the committee, and as rapidly as possible.

Mr. SLOAN. How about rice?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I have especially in mind sugar. Under Republican tariff I read you a list that will not sound good to the great mass of American people:

	Per cent.
Sugar duty	78.87
Champagne	70
Automobiles	45
Furs	50
Rare paintings and statuary	15
Diamonds	10

Diamond duty, 10 per cent. Sugar duty, 78. This shows in the true light the Republican theory of government. Are you surprised that this party faced defeat in almost every State in the Union? How many people buy diamonds? Every household buys sugar and pays about 35 cents duty on every dollar's worth.

The Democratic Party will be true to its promises and inaugurate reform in Government expenditures, thus reducing the necessity of so much tariff. This is a prolific field of investigation to save the people's money. The following is the language of Gen. W. W. Wotherspoon in a naval hearing of a recent date. He said:

> I am perfectly convinced that an army three times as efficient and probably twice as strong as we have now can be maintained for the money we are at present spending for the Army.

Investigations show lack of system. It has been charged freely on the floor of the House that over two hundred millions can be saved annually by application of business methods and economy. If this be true, revenue duties of the sugar class would not be needed by the Government. I believe the effectiveness of the Army and Navy can be increased on one-half the appropriation. This alone would mean a saving of one hundred and fifteen millions of the money of a tax-burdened people every year. My statement may appear an exaggeration, but, sir, I speak the words of soberness and truth. It is estimated that there is one employee of this Government for every 17 votes cast in the last presidential election. This does not include the Army and Navy. The people pay the price, and I am here representing the people protesting against this price.

Much is claimed for protection that the system did not do. The claim of the ex-Speaker that the protective tariff caused the recent prosperity in the South is absurd, and his attempt to credit the Republican Party and protective tariff with the increase of wealth from sixteen billions to one hundred and twenty-five billions since 1856 is also absurd. Is nothing due to the development of our resources, agricultural, mineral, and manufacturing? Is nothing due to the American manhood?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I want to make an explanation. I think you do not want to do the ex-Speaker an injustice.

Mr. TRIBBLE. By no means.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. His speech did not have anything to do with the tariff. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY], I think it was, who was talking, spoke of the increased wealth of this country from 1850 to 1860, and the ex-Speaker referred to what it had been from that time on to the present time, and said nothing about tariff having anything to do with it.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I think if you will investigate the RECORD and read Mr. BRANTLEY'S argument, and the question of the ex-Speaker, you will conclude he intended to give Republican tariff bills this credit. He certainly gave the tariff the credit for the prosperity in the South. Read his Canadian reciprocity speech, that part where his reminiscences carried him back to his boyhood home in the Carolinas. I say to you that the South has prospered notwithstanding the heavy arm of tariff oppression and discrimination against that section all these years.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Do you say that under the present policy of a majority of the House they are getting even as fast as they can, and the discrimination is going the other way?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I would like the gentleman to point out any discrimination coming our way. Indeed, I did not say that the discrimination was now in the South's favor.

CONCLUSION.

In conclusion I will say that it is natural in addressing this House on proposed legislation for our hearts, our minds, and our sympathies to reach out for the people of our own districts. Oh, that Members could rise to the magnitude of statesmen and see not only their own districts, but the whole country, with a vision of justice.

Mr. RAKER. I was going to ask the gentleman from Georgia this question: It was stated the other day on the floor of this House by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in regard to the South, that its hills were barren and practically worthless and useless.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Yes, sir; I am glad to answer that question. I desire to say in reply to the question you propound to me that there is no section in this Union more fertile than the Southern States. The Secretary of Agriculture said in a great speech in Atlanta about three months ago—and he is a great man and has done a great work for the Southern States—that the South is a marvelous country. Think of it, 100 boys in the South on 100 acres of land produced an average of 133 bushels of corn per acre. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SLOAN. And the Republicans will probably increase their votes by about a hundred, will they not?

Mr. TRIBBLE. In further answer to the question propounded to me by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] I will say, if you will investigate and look into the Yearbook, I think it is, or some of the agricultural publications recently issued by this Government, you will find a picture of a boy 10 miles from my home standing at the very head of corn production in the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And that is in the South.

Now, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who made the statement in regard to the South, that the South will not only in a few years add a billion dollars to her wealth every year from her cotton crop, but your constituents from the State of Pennsylvania will be coming down to the South, like the sons of Jacob into Egypt, to buy corn. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HENSLEY. And they will vote the Democratic ticket when they get there. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TRIBBLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. What explanation does the gentleman give to this question: The gentleman says his people are going to improve in the South in the future; what is his explanation of the fact that they have not improved and increased in wealth in the past as rapidly as other sections?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Yes, sir; I will answer that question with great pleasure. In the year 1865 the smoke from burning homes and wrecks of fortunes could be seen on every hilltop and valley of the South. One-half a century looks back on our struggle to regain our position in this Union. Year after year, from poverty-stricken homes where the wolf howled around the door in the years following the war, thousands, millions, and yea billions of dollars have flowed into the North, the East, and West in the form of pensions for Union soldiers. I will say to the gentleman from California that not one dollar of that money has ever found its way back to the South. And not only that, but in the years following the war the tide of immigration seeking homes to develop from the North and East westward took its flight on account of the negro in our midst. And now, sir, facing the conditions that I have mentioned and bearing the pensions of our own Confederate survivors upon our shoulders, and bearing the burdens of discriminating tariff placed upon us by the Republican Party, is it any wonder that the progress of the South has been slow?

Slowly but surely we have climbed the hills of prosperity, gaining steadfast footing at every step, mounting up at last to where we can see, thank God, the rising sun of prosperity, unequaled in the history of the world, bursting upon the South. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield an hour to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FRANCIS]. [Applause.]

Mr. FRANCIS. Mr. Chairman, I feel a hesitancy to discuss a proposition which has received the attention of the best minds of our country for the past 100 years. And a schedule now formed and recommended by such a high, honorable, and painstaking body of men as our Ways and Means Committee. Great credit is due them for their untiring effort to relieve the people. To preserve the great sheep industry of the country, on the one hand, and to keep and maintain the great woolen manufacturing industry of the country, on the other hand. This is a profound business proposition, and not a scheme of jugglery which Republican politics has tried to play since 1867; attempting to keep two balls in the air at the same time without letting either fall to the ground. It is to the manner of accomplishing and doing equal and exact justice to all that I shall particularly direct my remarks. We are dealing with a question which concerns 92,000,000 of people in the supply of the necessities of life, in their clothing and foodstuffs, largely supplied from the sheepfolds of the United States. A business in which every State in the Union is interested is the business of sheep raising, and in which business thousands of persons are engaged—in the occupation of woolgrowing and in the production of mutton. A business in which 1,213 mills are engaged and interested in producing clothes for our people and in giving employment to thousands of persons as wage earners; an industry in which the sheep of the United States number 58,000,000, valued at $235,000,000.

Out of this vast industry we are attempting to raise a certain amount of revenue for the support of the Government, and by doing so are exercising one of the great and serious powers of government—the taxing power—or, rather, attempting to untax the people in one respect and tax them in another, so as to equalize the burdens which they are required to bear.

When we consider that the reckless expenditures for governmental purposes made by the Sixtieth Congress placed upon each individual of this Republic approximately $13 per person—and the Sixty-first Congress did very little better—which have to be raised in the main by tariff duties, we little wonder that the ballots of the voters have changed the political complexion of this House. This enormous sum was levied upon the necessities of life. Money can not be picked up from cobblestones nor does it grow on trees, but comes from the people and as a tax upon the necessaries of life. In this we find the secret of the high cost of living.

What Member of the Sixtieth or Sixty-first Congress would care to go back to his district and tell his dear constituents that he had just voted upon his district and upon them $2,500,000 for a single Congress? Yet that is just what was done. Or who would care to say to one of his counties of 50,000 people, "We have placed upon your county $650,000 which your people must pay by indirect taxation"? Who would dare to submit to his county the proposition that they should vote upon such a county for the expense of government $650,000? I dare say there would not be enough votes cast for the proposition to be worth counting.

But this is the subtle policy of our Government, and has been since its foundation, to raise the necessary expenses of government by tariff duties; and it is a fact that the great sheep and woolen industries of our country have produced revenue for this purpose in the past two years second to none but sugar.

I want my position to be understood early in this discussion.

First. This bill is framed ostensibly on a revenue basis, and, to some extent, that for every cent which is levied upon raw wool or woolen goods entering our ports to that extent it increases or lowers the price of wool or woolen goods, as the case may be, and relieves the people to that extent from the high cost of manufactured goods.

Now, is this true? Upon the adoption of Schedule K the American Woolen Co. advances its price on all manufactured goods 36 per cent. Not only this, but that company, by some means, just about the same time of the adoption of this schedule, began manufacturing what they call an all-wool cloth, largely out of cotton and shoddy. They evidently, in order to produce such cloth as they have been selling and supplying to the people, have crossed a shoddy ram with a cotton jenny. [Applause.]

Shortly after the adoption of Schedule K it announced a price for XX Ohio raw wool of from 27 to 30 cents per pound. This wool had formerly been selling at a price ranging from 35 to 38 cents per pound; so it is readily seen that all legislation on wool tariff fails to reduce or enhance the price where there is an intervening power that can and does absolutely fix prices. Imagine a concern combining some 34 separate institutions or plants, comprising some 150 mills, at an aggregate ostensible capital of $69,000,000—an octopus, the product of which, in the form of Schedule K, is placed upon the back of every man, woman, and child in the United States—organized to rob and prey upon the people, organized to control prices and to buy the raw wool from our people at such prices as they see fit, organized to control the price and conditions of labor in its numerous factories.

The Democratic Party is unalterably opposed to trusts in any form and opposed to high protection in their interest.

And now do we wish to aid this gigantic trust by giving it practically free raw material with which it can carry on its scheme of exploitation and robbery?

I for one do not believe in placing within the power of this trust practically free raw wool or in enacting a tariff law of such low schedule that it can go to my constituents and to all the woolgrowers throughout the country, as it will do, and say to them, the tariff is reduced and consequently we can not pay you but 18 or 20 cents per pound for your wool; and this thing it is sure to do.

This gigantic corporation controls more than 31 per cent of the woolen goods manufactured in this country and practically all of the worsted goods made here. Representing, as I have said, an ostensible capital of $69,000,000, organized in the year 1899 by combining the following mills:

Anchor Mills, Pascoag, R. I.; Anderson Mills, Scowhegan, Me.; Assabet Mills, Maynard, Mass.; Baltic Mills, Enfield, N. H.; Bay State Mills, Lowell, Mass.; Beaver Brook Mills, Lowell, Mass.; Beoli Mills, Fitchburg, Mass.; Brown Mills, Dover, Me.; Chase Mills, Webster, Mass.; Fitchburg Mills, Fitchburg, Mass.; Fulton Mills, Fulton, N. Y.; Hecla Mills, Uxbridge, Mass.; Kennebec Mills, Fairfield, Me.; Lebanon Mills, Lebanon, N. H.; Manton Mills, Manton, R. I.; Moosup Mills, Moosup, Conn.; National and Providence Worsted Mills, Providence, R. I.; Prospect Mills, Lawrence, Mass.; Puritan Mills, Plymouth, Mass.; Rau Mills, Franklin, Mass.; Roverside Mills, Providence, R. I.; Saranac Mills, Blackstone, Mass.; Sawyer Mills, Dover, N. H.; Valley Mills, Providence, R. I.; Vassalboro Mills, North Vassalboro, Me.; Washington Mills, Lawrence, Mass.; and Weybosset Mills, Providence, R. I.

No one will believe for a moment that these mills were ever worth one-fifth of $69,000,000; but the directors and officials of these corporations were evidently called together and had a meeting, and those financial sharks were present who knew so well how to create something out of nothing, and began to put prices on their several works. No. 1 would say, "Our plant is worth a million dollars," when, in fact, the whole thing, bag and baggage, was not worth over $250,000. And so they passed it down the line, Nos. 2, 3, and 4, until they took in 28 of such works. How easy it is for persons to deal with each other in this way. They buy their own property and sell to themselves, and to them the most pleasant thing in the world is to sell for five or seven times more than their mill is worth.

Quoting from a statement of William M. Wood, president of this gigantic octopus, after speaking of the vast combination I have described, he says:

"With such a combination of mills and capital it has been able to effect many economic improvements in manufacture not otherwise possible. The company produces a large amount of goods suitable for all classes—60,000 different fabrics and styles are shown each year. The company buys direct its own raw material; it spins its own yarn, weaves its own cloth, and maintains one of the most expensive organizations in the world for the disposal of its fabrics direct."

And here let me state that these fabrics are sold to their jobbers at a fixed price, and by an ironclad agreement, below which no merchant dare to sell the same or cut the price. If he does, he is no longer a customer of the American Woolen Co., as he would not be permitted to receive or handle their goods.

This same William M. Wood, when speaking before the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, February 1, 1911, in this city, said:

"Schedule K, much maligned, much misunderstood, if properly understood would be the most appreciated of any schedule in the tariff; and if all schedules in the tariff were so scientifically based and as well poised and balanced as Schedule K it would be the most remarkable document next to the Constitution of the United States that the human mind has ever produced. Schedule K protects labor in the woolen and worsted mills of the country."

Now, gentlemen, you see what this great beneficiary of Schedule K, who has lived and fattened off the people, has to say of its wonderful virtues. And in the same address he further said:

"You can count upon the fingers of one hand the wealthy woolen manufacturers of America."

Yes, gentlemen; when it gets through with its system of extermination you can count them on one finger of your hand. And further he said:

"That a suit of clothes bought for the President of the United States"—

mark you, making the President the personage of the suit of clothes—

"yields a profit to the man who made the cloth of not over 38 cents on the suit; and these figures have been challenged by gentlemen from Pennsylvania, who have stated that their profits were less than one-half that. I have seen overcoats made of cloth of my mills—and overcoats for boys—whose profits were less than 9 cents."

Now, gentlemen, you see that this corporation, so much imposed upon, is making practically nothing on the product it is putting out for the American people. If we were to believe this, it would have long since been out of business. This they do: Sell their goods at practically no profit when they wish to crush some competitor out of business. This is one of the tricks of the trade; but when he is crushed out of business, the 38 cents profit rises to something like twenty times that.

We do not wonder that tariff legislation should engender such a fight upon the floor of the House when we consider that under high protection there has grown up such gigantic monopolies as the Standard Oil Co., the United States Steel Co., the American Sugar Refining Co., and the American Tobacco Co., each having its specific field of prey; and the American Woolen Co., which preys upon all the people. Under this high-protective system of the Republican Party these abuses have grown and flourished.

The Chinese Government, further back than history records, must have labored for a thousand years to build a wall 1,500 miles long, 50 feet high, and about 30 feet wide, of solid masonry, to prevent the robbers of the north from coming down upon their lands and robbing the country of its wealth and property. The Republican Party has been 40 years engaged in building a high-tariff wall around the United States in order that the robbers may be kept in, so as to prey upon the people. [Applause.]

And this is not the only country which has been infested with this class of persons or corporations, but back in the eighteenth century—take from one of the noted writers of that day this famous passage:

"These vampires were corpses who went out of their graves at night to suck the blood of the living, either at their throats or stomachs, after which they returned to their cemeteries. The person so sucked waned, grew pale, and fell into consumption, while the sucking corpses grew fat, got rosy, and enjoyed an excellent appetite. It was in Silesia, Hungary, Austria, Moravia, and Lorraine that the dead made this good cheer. We never heard a word of vampires in London or in Paris. I confess that in both these cities there were stockjobbers, men in business, that sucked the blood of the people in broad daylight; but they were not dead, but corrupt. These true suckers lived not in cemeteries, but in very agreeable places."

These corpses compare very favorably to our modern trust corporation—without a soul, without any regard for the Government or the people of the Government, without any regard for church or state, without any moral idea of their duty to their fellow man, without sympathy, cold, bloodless, heartless; in fact, corpses; and there is no better word to describe it—those who go about and suck the blood of the American people. [Applause.]

It has been suggested that under the late decision of our Supreme Court, and in order to fit the present exigencies of government and conduct of our people and trust corporations to the Ten Commandments, that the words "reasonable" or "unreasonable" should be read into each of them. For instance: "Thou shalt not unreasonably do so and so." The eighth commandment should read thus: "Thou shalt not steal an unreasonable amount, and thou shalt not bear the penalty therefor if you are found guilty if it shall in anywise disturb any big business interests." Or when the court in sentencing a prisoner says to the prisoner, "Stand up; what have you to say why judgment should not be passed upon you?" And the answer, "Well, I have robbed and taken only a reasonable amount in a reasonable manner." "That will do; the sentence of the court is that you may continue your robbing in a reasonable manner for six months, after which time you must cease such operations." [Applause.]

These several factories comprising the American Woolen Co. that I have described, then surrender their charters and all combine under one trust charter and issue new stock for five or six times the value of their several plants. They can put upon the market one-half of these stocks to the unsuspecting public and receive therefor in cash two and a half times what their 34 plants are really worth and yet retain the other half of the stock and with it control the directorate and management of the corporation.

The question now comes up, How can this corporation pay dividends on such an inflated capital?

It now begins by raising the prices on its 60,000 varieties of cloth 36 per cent. Next, it commences to cheapen its products by the use of South Sea cotton, both in the chain and filling, and of shoddy and such other inferior stuff as it can get to fill into its goods, thereby imposing upon the public an inferior cloth, which will not stand in either color or material. Next, it prepares the coarse No. 3 wool, which is considered the lowest and most inferior class of wool under the Payne-Aldrich bill, and weaves it into a fair-looking cloth. Next, it goes to the woolgrower and reduces the price of his wool 10 cents on the pound. Is that not going some to make dividends? What next does it do to make dividends? There are certain ingredients, appliances, machinery, and chemicals used in the business to be supplied at its different works. The man who has sold to them heretofore goes to the old stand and finds that Company No. 1 will give him only 50 per cent as much for this material as he formerly received. He goes to the next plant, and to another, and receives the same reply, only 50 per cent. He inquires the reason for this reduction of price and says that he has been to four different plants, and all that he can get for his property is one-half of the former price. He is now informed that these several factories have formed a combine, or trust, and are now one company, and that they practically buy all such supplies and that there is no other market for them, and consequently they fix the price at 50 cents on the dollar, and if he does not choose to take that he can keep his material. Here they begin to make dividends again.

But this is not all. Here are men and women who have coined their life blood, muscle, bone, and sinew into a particular kind of work, and by their diligence and skill have made these mills a success. They are told that their wages hereafter will be a certain reduction; or they can turn out so much more piecework than formerly for their day's work. They remonstrate and threaten to quit their employment and to go to another plant. But there is no other works; they all belong to the same octopus. These laborers' lives and energies have been trained in this work; they can do nothing else. They have the alternative to be turned out on the commons or take just whatever this trust employer may choose to offer, and so they make dividends again.

Truly, a commercial despotism has been and is sapping the life of the people. These trusts have become partners with our Government and have written the tariff schedules for the past 25 years in their own interest and in the interests of monopoly. Schedule K, when last enacted, was written in the interest of the American Woolen Co.

The dealers in the stock of this Woolen Trust, when my resolution was introduced on May 3 to make an investigation of its questionable methods, caused a decline in the price of its common stock from 35 to 33, and its preferred stock also wavered downward, and later it was currently reported that this investigation would not be had, when its common stock was advanced from 33 to 34 and the preferred from 90¾ to 95. There is evidently something rotten in the make-up and management of this corporation, there being $29,501,100 common stock, which was issued by way of bonus and represents no value whatever.

Not only has the civilian felt the clutch of the power of this trust, but it has had the effrontery to hold up the United States Army and has been furnishing to it its worsted goods exclusively. The War Department, recognizing it to be a trust, on May 24, 1911, advertised for bids for woolens for the Army. They stated that trust conditions exist in this worsted industry and have decided to break the grip of the American Woolen Trust. This is a commendable position for our Army officers to take and gives strength and dignity to the organization. We certainly think it time to take drastic measures against this octopus, for whatever tariff legislation we may enact, so long as it exists, will fall short of giving the people proper relief.

We now proceed to take up the bill as proposed by the committee and discuss it from a practical and business point of view.

The advent of wool growing and woolen manufacturing began with the Government. Just across the Potomac, at Arlington, Washington, our first President, began to rear one of the first flocks in the country and encourage sheep husbandry, and whose Arlington long-wool sheep, as they were called, were far famed. When he stood up to take his first oath of office—and the first presidential oath ever taken—he was clothed in woolens made from the first woolen mills in Connecticut—American-manufactured goods. The sheep industry, therefore, is interwoven with our earliest history, and the encouragement of manufactured woolens was the first concern of our infant Republic.

In Wright's "Wool Growing and the Tariff," Harvard's economic studies, at page 22, we find that—

In the year 1810 the State of New York, in order to encourage sheep raising, gave a premium of $80, in the nature of a bounty, to each county for the best specimen of manufactured woolen cloth; and in the year 1807 passed a law giving a premium of $50 to each county for the finest merino ram imported into each county.

But it now appears that our legislators from that great State have lost the moorings and traditions of their fathers, and now come here advocating free wool and a destruction of that great industry which their fathers were so intent on building up. Possibly the present generation is more interested in fleecing the "lambs" on the Wall Street Stock Exchange, and in giving the Wool Trust free wool with which to exploit the people, than they are in keeping the traditions of their fathers.

The first woolen mill set up and operated west of the Ohio River was operated in Steubenville, in the sixteenth congressional district of Ohio, and for years the manufacture of woolen cloth became quite an industry in that town and vicinity, and to-day one part of that city is known as "Jeans Town" from the name of the goods manufactured there. Sheep-growing industry received early encouragement in this district, and it is a historical fact that to-day the counties of my district and the county adjoining of Brooks, W. Va., and Washington, Pa., produce the finest Merino wool in the world, and to-day in the sixteenth district alone there are 398,000 sheep, and in the great State of Ohio 3,907,055 sheep, of the value of $16,000,000.

Representing, as I do, such a vast productive industry I can not assent to a bill which, if enacted into law in its present form, will wreck the business and destroy the future hope of every sheep raiser in my district and State.

I shall now consider the present bill upon its merits and from a Democratic standpoint.

The original idea of a tariff was for the purpose of raising revenue for the Government. It was a principle enunciated by our first party leaders and brought down to the present day. This revenue tariff must be levied for the support of governmental expenses, for the Government is ours, and it takes cash and plenty of it to support its varied institutions. The policy of our Government is and always has been to make the foreign importer pay a tax for the privilege of bringing into this country foreign manufactured goods, made by foreign cheap labor, in competition with our domestic goods and labor.

This Government never had any better way of raising revenue than by tariff, and to talk about free trade with everything and every country of the world, until some way is devised to meet the expenses of Government, would be national suicide.

This Government owes to its citizens respectable employment at remunerative wages, and at a wage commensurate with a fair standard of living, and should guarantee to every citizen life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness in the broadest sense. This is due the spinner and weaver as certainly as to any other employment. It owes to the woolgrower and sheep raiser the same obligation. They supply the wool for our people's clothes, for our Army and Navy. They are the source from which we receive the great food supply of mutton, and which tends to reduce and maintain an equilibrium on the prices of meat throughout the Union.

Each of these classes interested in the production of wool and labor in the factory must bear their share of the expenses of Government, and when there is neither demand nor necessity for ruining them in their occupation we fail to see the reason for doing so.

We have two classes of extremists in this country—the one a free trader who tries to find a home in and to disintegrate the Democratic Party, and the other the high protectionist, who belongs to and has destroyed the Republican Party, who believes in building a wall around the people so high that no foreign goods can come in, thereby promoting monopoly to devour the people.

This high protection has proven to be the canker which has destroyed the vitals of the Government, has enthroned monopoly and bred trusts, aggregated the resources and wealth of the country in the hands of the few, and enthroned a commercial despotism which is becoming more powerful than the Government itself. Our citizens have long since come to the conclusion that the corporate artificial person, created by law, has become so powerful that there is very little place left for the individual God-made man.

We become astonished when we learn that during the year 1909, 90,000 of our citizens withdrew from our Government and forsook the Stars and Stripes to make their homes in Canada under the British flag. These were agriculturists, the very persons whose interests we are affecting by this bill.

Gen. Hancock was defeated for President because he dared to say that the tariff was a local issue, but if the debates on reciprocity in this House demonstrated anything, it demonstrated that fact. The gentlemen from Washington, North Carolina, and from Maine could stand reciprocity, provided you did not include free lumber. The gentlemen from Dakota could stand if, too, if you did not include wheat. The gentlemen from the South could stand it so long as it did not interfere with oranges, lemons, rice, sugar, and cotton; still, many of these same gentlemen will rise up in holy horror when you suggest a fair protection for wool and woolens. "Oh, consistency, thou art a jewel." And so every specially blessed part of the Union were bobbing up here and there and claiming the incidental protection that a revenue tariff would afford. There are some of these self-same Democrats who absolutely go raving mad over the word "protection," but I, for one, was never disturbed at the sound of that word when it is used solely for revenue, and not made a means to monopoly. The Democratic Party in no platform ever written declared for free wool, but Congress several times undertook to commit our party to free raw wool, and each time its representatives were relegated to private life. In 1887 and 1888 Congress struggled for months to enact the Mills bill and cut the tariff on wool to a minimum, and the party was defeated at the polls at the national election that fall.

Mr. MACON. Does the gentleman know that the Mills bill carried a provision for free wool, and that the Democratic convention which sat in that year specifically indorsed that bill by resolution?

Mr. FRANCIS. They may have indorsed that bill. I do not know.

Mr. MACON. I think I will be able to show the gentleman by the words of the convention that they did that.

Mr. FRANCIS. I will read from the platform. That will probably satisfy the gentleman.

If party principles are to be found anywhere, they would be expected to be found in our party platform. Take, for instance, the platform of 1888, which reads as follows:

Our established domestic industries and enterprises should not and need not be endangered by the reduction and correction of the burdens of taxation. On the contrary, a fair and careful revision of our tax laws, with due allowance for the difference between the wages of American and foreign labor, must promote and encourage every branch of such industries and enterprises by giving them assurance of an extended market and steady and continuous operations. In the interests of American labor, which should in no event be neglected, the revision of our tax laws contemplated by the Democratic Party should promote the advantage of such labor by cheapening the cost of necessaries of life in the home of every workingman and at the same time securing to him steady and remunerative employment. Upon this question of tariff reform, so closely concerning every phase of our national life, and upon every question involved in the problem of good government, the Democratic Party submits its principles and professions to the intelligent suffrages of the American people.

Does that read like free wool? Does that read like we should let in foreign pauper-made goods to crush out our woolen mills and stop the hum of the spindles and cause them to rust and decay in inactivity and the laborer to come to want? It would have been wise for the Democratic Party to have had this plank in their platform copyrighted, so as to prevent the Republican Party from purloining it in the year 1896, which it did.

In 1894 Congress adopted the Wilson-Gorman free-wool schedule, and our sheep were driven from the hills to the slaughter-house, and so was the Democratic Party. Thus it was that our Congress twice attempted to foist free raw wool on our people when our party platform did not ask it to do so, and we have seen the consequences.

Now let us read from the message of President Cleveland:

The proposition with which we have to deal is the reduction of the revenue received by the Government and indirectly paid by the people from customs duties. The question of free trade is not involved, nor is there now any occasion for the discussion of the wisdom or expediency of the protective system. Justice and fairness dictate that in any modification of our present laws relating to revenue the interests and industries which have been encouraged by such laws, and in which our citizens have large investments, should not be ruthlessly injured or destroyed. We should also deal with the subject in such manner as to protect the interests of American labor, which is the capital of our workingmen. Its stability and proper remuneration furnish the most justifiable pretext for a protective policy. Within these limitations a certain reduction should be made in our customs revenue.

Does that sound like free wool and free woolen goods?

I have little patience with the man who wishes to place a tariff indiscriminately on wool and woolens. Every tariff must, of necessity, in its workings help some one; but are you going to say that because of this fact we should not levy a tariff at all? Must the man who writes the schedule do so blindfolded and without any discrimination? Certainly not. And when it is levied with care and discrimination, to that extent you are looking after the interests of the producer and laborer of the country; and this is levying tariff for revenue, having regard as to where its burdens shall fall and in order to do the most good to the greatest number of our people. [Applause.]

Schedule K since 1867 has been a contemptible, trust-breeding schedule, written in the interest of the manufacturers.

The schedule as here proposed is upon an ad valorem basis, the proper basis on which to frame a wool and woolen tariff.

It is confidently asserted, and the fact is borne out by the proof, that the head officers of the National Woolgrowers' Association and the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, of whom the American Woolen Co. is the controlling figure, have allied themselves together to hoodwink the wool producers of this country.

For instance, take the letter of Gordon Dobson, vice president of the Carded Woolen Manufacturers' Association, to the American Sheep Breeders of Chicago, of March 8, which seems to explain the true situation and alliance of these companies, and is as follows:

It is in every way remarkable that you and the National Wool Growers' Association, who claim to represent the woolgrowers, should unite in this work of preventing the woolgrowers from knowing the truth about Schedule K. I have the most reliable information that the officers of the National Wool Growers' Association are as great offenders as you in this work of keeping the woolgrowers in ignorance. About a year ago F. W. Gooding, then president of the National Wool Growers' Association, and another official of that organization had an interview at Boston with Robert Bleakie, a director of the Carded Woolen Manufacturers' Association. Mr. Bleakie explained to them the special privilege under paragraph 366 of the Payne bill, by which washed worsted wool of class 2 was admitted at the single duty of 12 cents a pound. Both President Gooding and his companion denied repeatedly and vigorously that such a rate was imposed by Schedule K. His companion took the copy of the bill out of his bag and read the paragraph over carefully, not only once, but several times, without discovering the joker. Finally, as he was reading it through for the fourth time, President Gooding exclaimed, "Damn it, Pete, they're right." And Pete had to acknowledge that they were right. Just think of it. President Gooding was the head of an association calling itself "National." He was one of the seven woolgrowers who met the five worsted spinners at Chicago on October 15, 1908, and made a "solemn compact" to stand pat on Schedule K, and nevertheless he was ignorant of the fact that that schedule had allowed the worsted spinners since 1867 to import washed wool of class 2 at a single rate of 12 cents a pound. We may well be astonished by such ignorance in a man in a responsible position, but imagine our feelings when the same man a year after he had been informed of that discrimination against the woolgrowers deliberately suppresses President Moir's letter at the Portland convention and thus prevents the rank and file of the woolgrowers from knowing the truth.

From this it is very apparent that the carded-woolen manufacturers have sold their birthright to the worsted manufacturers for a mess of pottage.

Uncle Sam was blind when Schedule K was first written, just as Abraham of old was blind. His son Jacob, the worsted manufacturer, after deluding the Wool Growers' Association and getting them to make a bargain with Esau, the woolly man, put on the worsted fleece and went to Uncle Sam's Ways and Means Committee in the year 1867 and received the blessing in the form of Schedule K, and has kept and maintained it practically ever since, with the assistance of our Government, and has ruled the wool kingdom of this country to the present day.

This Jacob's brother Esau, the real woolly man, has lost his birthright and become tired of his bargain, and it is only through his kicking that the people have discovered the real iniquity of Schedule K. This Schedule K was founded upon the assumption that 4 pounds of grease wool were required to make 1 pound of wool cloth. This is absolutely false, either as an average or as a fact. Its provisions are prohibitive as to the greater part of foreign wool, and especially as to foreign woolen goods. To demonstrate what I say, you have only to look at the character of the wool which is being imported.

There was concealed within this Schedule K a special privilege in the interest of the worsted spinner ever since the year 1867, with the exception of the years 1894 to 1897, during the operation of the Wilson bill. When the Dingley Act was passed this same concealed special privilege was again reenacted in toto, and was retained in the Payne-Aldrich bill entire. This discrimination grew out of three things: First, the system of specific duties; second, the system of classifying wools as Nos. 1, 2, and 3; and, third, the theory that 4 pounds of grease wool were required to make 1 pound of cloth.

Wool varies in shrinkage from 15 to 80 per cent—that is, for example, by taking 100 pounds of wool, some of which, when the dirt and grease are separated from it, will produce 85 pounds of wool and 15 pounds of grease and dirt. Others will produce 20 pounds of clean wool and 80 pounds of dirt and grease. Under this Payne-Aldrich Schedule K some factories can bring in fleece-washed wool, shrinking from 15 to 25 per cent, on which the duty is only 12 cents per pound; while other growths of wool, suited for other kinds of machinery and goods, and are of this heavy grease and shrinkage if washed, are dutiable at 22 cents per pound, and if scoured at 44 cents per pound, which is prohibitory.

There is a specially favored wool, known as skirted wool, which comes in washed at a single specific duty of 12 cents per pound, and 11 cents unwashed; some years as much as 30,000,000 pounds of this, which displaces from 60,000,000 to 80,000,000 pounds of domestic wool by reason of the difference in the shrinkage of the two qualities. This is used principally in our worsted mills, and is a specific privilege and discrimination of the worst kind. This has been going on against the American woolgrower and the carded-woolen manufacturer since the year 1867, excepting the few years that the Wilson bill was in operation. This is a direct discrimination against our Ohio wools as well as against the other wool-producing States, for the American Woolen Co. have chosen to import and purchase this foreign skirted wool, which shrinks from 15 to 20 per cent, in preference to our Ohio fleece, which shrinks from 52 to 65 per cent; and this is the "nigger in the wood pile" or sleeper that underlies Schedule K and makes it so obnoxious to the woolgrower, the wool consumer, and the woolen manufacturers other than the worsted manufacturers. This skirted wool comes into our ports in its natural state at 11 cents duty per pound.

Now, what is skirted wool? How many Members of this House know the meaning and significance of skirted wool? Let me explain: In shearing the sheep these foreign woolgrowers first take off the wool from the legs, belly, buttocks, and neck and head of the sheep, thereby discarding all of the cheap, inferior, dirty, greasy, and heavy parts of the fleece. The balance of the fleece is the choice and finest wool on the sheep. This comes into our ports, under Schedule K, washed, at a duty of 12 cents per pound, and in its natural state at 11 cents per pound.

Now let us demonstrate how this competes with our domestic wools. Some will say that it is a coarse wool and not the kind grown in the United States, which is not correct, for much other wool comes in skirted at 11 cents duty. But let me say to you that every yard of worsted cloth made from it displaces a yard of wool cloth, and every pound of this wool imported displaces from 2 to 3 pounds of domestic wool.

For illustration, let us take 20 pounds of this skirted wool, entering our ports, washed, at a duty of 12 cents per pound, as against 20 pounds of our domestic wool.

Now, 20 pounds of skirted loses 20 per cent in cleaning and shrinkage, or 4 pounds, leaving 16 pounds clean wool. Our American wool, 20 pounds, shrinks 60 per cent, or 12 pounds, leaving 8 pounds clean wool. Now, our domestic wool has the whole fleece, composed of all its parts in it, and is worth 60 cents per clean pound, or 8 pounds at 60 cents, which is $4.80, while this imported wool, being the choice clean wool of the highest possible grade, is worth 90 cents per clean pound, or 16 pounds at 90 cents, which is $14.40. The value is in the ratio of $4.80 to $14.40. By this it will be seen that our domestic wool bears the relation to this skirted foreign wool of 1 to 3. Hence the specific duty of 12 cents on this class of foreign wool will, in fact, when figured by taking into account both quantity and value, represent but one-third of 12 cents duty, which is 4 cents, and this is all the protection the deluded American woolgrower has had since 1867. This analysis will practically be the same upon the skirted wool, which is imported at 11 cents duty per pound, which shrinks only 30 per cent, and the duty paid on each of these grades of wool when compared with ours is 4 cents, and we have now uncovered the real "nigger" in the woodpile.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman 30 minutes more.

Mr. FRANCIS. In order to be informed on this question of skirted wool, on May 15, 1911, I wrote Charles R. Skinner, assistant appraiser of wool in the appraiser's warehouse, New York City, asking him about this character of wool and as to the meaning of skirted wool as received at that port, and received from him the following reply:

DEAR SIR: I have yours of the 15th instant, making inquiry as to the meaning of skirted wool under the present tariff. In reply I inclose a drawing of a skirted wool, with explanations. These wools do not come free—they are very generally classed as wool, class 1, unwashed, duty 11 cents per pound. The duty of 11 cents applies to all parts of the skirted skin.

Very truly, CHARLES R. SKINNER.

Our imports show that almost all of this wool comes in at 11 cents a pound in the grease, which will not shrink over 25 to 30 per cent, or washed at 12 cents per pound, which shrinks less.

The foregoing illustration shows that by hoodwinking the American people in this way wool has been imported under this specific duty and favored schedule at a very low rate.

It is shown also by the imports that the other large importations of wool are brought in as wool known as No. 3 at the very low rate of 3 and 4 cents duty per pound. These wools are used principally in the manufacturing of carpets, but they also compete to a great extent with our domestic clips, where used in our worsted mills for the coarser clothing.

I again wrote Mr. Skinner on May 18, 1911, and on May 19 I received the following reply:

DEAR SIR: Under paragraph 369 wools of the second class, whether washed or unwashed, being of the English blood, are returned for duty at 12 cents per pound. Wools of the English blood, as a rule, come to this port washed.

Very truly, yours, CHARLES R. SKINNER.

So that it is very apparent that this is the kind of wool which has been largely imported into our country, and the bill under consideration totally puts to rout this shameful discrimination, being framed on an ad valorem basis.

In 1910 there was imported into this country in all $47,687,293 worth of raw wool. Of this amount there was imported of—

Class 1, at a duty of 11 cents per pound, 107,996,167 pounds, valued at	$25,147,142
Class 2, at a duty of 12 cents per pound, 26,687,672 pounds, valued at	6,824,079
Class 3, at a duty of 3 and 4 cents per pound, 84,692,274 pounds, valued at	9,309,323
Total	41,280,744

Now, it is seen that nearly all of our importations of wool are brought into the country at 11 and 12 cents under this favored skirting clause, but, in fact, they come in at no greater rate of duty than the carpet wools—that is, 3 and 4 cents per pound—when compared with our domestic wools.

Now, let us take the history of Schedule K, when this skirting clause was written into it in 1867, and mark the effect on the wool market. In 1866 wool was 70 cents. In 1868, immediately after, it dropped to 46 cents per pound. On a gold basis in 1866, 50 cents per pound, down to 34 cents per pound in 1868. So it is very apparent that this was the thing that caused the slump in wool prices at that time.

But our manufacturers and sheep raisers had adjusted their business to this schedule until the Wilson free-wool schedule of 1894 was enacted, when it is seen that wool in 1893 ranged in price from 29 to 33 cents per pound, but in 1895 fell, and ranged in price from 16½ to 20 cents per pound. Will anyone contend for a moment that this did not cause disaster to our business interests?

If the Members of this House have forgotten the effect of this wool schedule upon the country, it will be well to refer to some statistics to refresh their memories. Immediately before the adoption of the Wilson bill there were 47,000,000 sheep in the United States, valued at $2.66 per head. Immediately after, in the year 1895, the average price of our sheep was $1.58, not quite the price of a good-sized Shanghai chicken to-day. And in 1896 our sheep numbered 36,800,000, and had fallen off in two years 10,000,000 in number. They had gone to the slaughterhouse, and the business of the sheep raiser was ruined.

Let us now see the effect on importation of wool under the tariff of 1894. In that year there was imported 55,000,000 pounds of wool. This low amount might have been partly on account of the anticipation of a free-wool schedule; but in the year 1895 there was imported 206,000,000 pounds, and in the year 1897 it had increased to the enormous sum of 350,000,000 pounds; and during the same period the imports of manufactured goods, in 1894, was $19,500,000, while in 1896 the importation had increased to $53,500,000, both of which causes entirely crushed our woolgrowing industry in this country.

The importation of 350,000,000 pounds of raw wool into the country in 1897 was more wool than was raised in the United States in that year. In the year 1910 our entire product was 321,000,000 pounds, and there was imported by way of manufactured cloth as much, if not more, than that of raw wool, so that it will be seen that under the Wilson bill there came into this country twice as much wool in a single year as was raised in the United States in the year 1910. This proposed bill embodies a lower duty than did the Wilson bill, which let wool come in free and made goods dutiable at 50 per cent. This bill makes wool dutiable at 20 per cent and cloth at 40 per cent. When you deduct the ad valorem from the cloth required to compensate for a 20 per cent duty upon wool, which the foreign manufacturer has free, which would be 12 to 13 per cent, it brings the net duty on a free-wool basis to 27 to 28 per cent, or just a little over half of the Wilson bill, and is a price against which our industries can not compete.

In Canada they have free wool, but the duty on manufactured articles against Great Britain is 30 per cent and 35 per cent against other countries.

Half of the woolen machinery that was operated in Canada 10 years ago is now idle. Considerable of the machinery has been broken up and made into scrap, and not over half of the remaining mills are in operation. They have a lower operating expense than we have and skilled workmen, and it is fair to conclude that if this bill goes into effect this great dual industry of wool manufacturing and wool producing will be crushed, as it was in 1894.

A great deal is said about the price at which an English tailor-made, all-wool suit of clothes can be obtained in Great Britain as compared with the same suit and material in this country.

Great stress is put upon the fact of the wide difference in prices, in support of the claim that the whole trouble is in the tariff duties between the two countries, when in truth and in fact that enters very little into the matter, and almost the entire difference is in the price of labor bestowed upon the making of the goods in America as compared with the cheap labor of Europe.

Take, for instance, an English-made suit of clothes. The prices entering into such a suit are as follows:

Cloth, 3½ yards	$2.50
Labor for making a sack coat	1.75
Labor for making a vest	.50
Labor for making trousers	.37
Trimmings necessary for the suit, complete	1.25
Labor for cutting	.50
Total, for making the suit complete and furnishing all materials	6.87

This suit will sell in England for $15.

We will now take an American suit of American goods of the same class:

3½ yards of cloth	$8.50
Labor for making sack coat	8.25
Labor for making trousers	2.50
Labor for making vest	2.00
Good average trimmings, complete	4.00
Labor for cutting	2.00
Total, for suit complete	27.25

This suit will be sold by the American merchant tailor at $40.

I simply draw this parallel, having obtained it from one who has worked just recently in both countries and is able to give the figures, so as to show that the great discrepancy in these prices is caused by the difference of labor in the two countries. And this will hold good as to the importation of foreign ready-made goods when brought in competition with our ready-made goods.

It will be noticed that the English cloth in this computation costs $2.50 as against the American-made cloth at $8.50. This is due to two reasons: First, our trust methods in inflating and putting up the price to the American consumer, as I have already shown; but the principal difference is caused by reason of the comparative cost of labor in this country and in England. This bears the same relation to the manufacture of the cloth as it does to the making of the two suits of clothes, as demonstrated in the foregoing illustration.

A great many persons are laboring under the impression that the high cost of a suit of clothes in this country is directly enhanced by the high tariff on raw wool that is imported into this country to be used in our factories.

When you analyze this proposition it is plain to anyone that the duty on this raw washed wool at 12 cents per pound—there being about 3½ pounds of wool in an all-wool suit of clothes and which is scarcely found among the American makes upon the shelves of our merchant tailors—that this duty of 12 cents a pound on the wool would not make, in the aggregate, to exceed 50 or 60 cents added to that suit of clothes. But under Schedule K the woolen imports of cloth were placed at a prohibitive rate, and from this it can plainly be seen that the American Wool Trust has had the grand opportunity of making prices to suit itself to fleece the people. It is plain to be seen that under Schedule K of the Payne-Aldrich bill it has been so framed that it produces very little revenue on the importation of wool, and, being prohibitive of the importation of manufactured woolen cloth, that there is very little revenue derived from that source. Hence, the American Woolen Trust has the matter of fixing prices in its own hands.

Now, if this tariff would have the effect to drive our sheep to the shambles, then it should not be enacted; or if its operations will be such as to close down our woolen and worsted mills, again I say it should not be enacted. It places a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem on raw wool, noil, top, waste, and so forth, and of course this dispenses with the necessity of classifying the different kinds of wool as Nos. 1, 2, and 3.

On combed wool, tops, roving or roping, and so forth, 25 per cent ad valorem.

On yarns, and so forth, 30 per cent ad valorem.

On manufactured woolens an average of about 42½ per cent ad valorem, ranging from 25 per cent to 50 per cent ad valorem, making the principal articles which are shipped into our ports at about 40 per cent ad valorem.

Our Ways and Means Committee have made comparisons for the purpose of this bill with the Wilson-Gorman bill, the Springer bill of 1892, and the Mills bill of 1888.

These last two bills never became law, but were simply the production of a committee, and why they or either of them should be given any consideration in framing the present bill I am at great loss to know. The practical workings of neither of said proposed bills were ever tested, either in the interest of the people or as revenue producers; there is, in fact, nothing to be gained from a comparison with them, except it be to demonstrate two Democratic failures along free-trade lines, which culminated finally in the free trade Wilson bill, which accomplished the ruin that the other two bills would have done had they become laws.

The advocates of this bill claim it is a revenue producer, and they demonstrate how it shall be obtained by showing how its operations will flood our country by both foreign-made goods and foreign-grown wools.

There is no industry which so nearly concerns all the people of the United States as the woolen industry. It affects every State in the Union in the production of wool and mutton, every wearer of woolen goods, every one of the vast number employed in the 1,213 great woolen plants of our country, which turn out an annual product of manufactured woolens of $381,000,000. This great woolgrowing industry surprises us when we consider that there are 58,000,000 sheep in the United States, representing a valuation of $235,000,000, permeating every State in this Union, and every State of the Union has over 100,000 sheep, excepting eight States.

You will notice the falling off in the number, value per head, and farm value of sheep immediately after this skirting clause, which I have explained was enacted in 1867, and also notice the same falling off under the free-wool Wilson bill in 1894.

Our last census has alarmed the Government at the exodus of our population from the farms to city life, until it has become the cry of the nation, "Back to the farm!" But the farmer who raises hay, corn, oats, potatoes, and wheat has extracted from these farms their vitality until they will respond no more. He has taken everything from the soil without replenishing its fertility, and hence they are abandoning them. Let the farmer go back to the farm with his sheep, which enriches the land as they develop and grow; let the order of husbandry be reversed and the lands be rejuvenated by the rearing of sheep, and this national alarm will be dispelled. [Applause.]

Now, can our American woolgrowers compete with foreign wool under these schedules? Can the manufacturers of woolen goods compete with foreign importers under these schedules? These are the two great questions to be solved, and these are the questions which a million American producers and workmen are waiting to hear answered in the affirmative.

Our Ways and Means Committee evidently either has been misinformed as to the number of sheep in the United States or has made a miscalculation. The number given in its table represents the number of sheep of shearing age, and makes no account of lambs and mutton sheep which are marketed each year. The true number and value in January, 1910, is just what I have quoted, but according to the unpublished reports this number has increased in the last year about 10 per cent, and our sheep to-day will number close to 65,000,000 head. The number and kinds of sheep in the five counties comprising the sixteenth district of Ohio, as taken from the latest figures obtainable, is as follows:

Number of sheep on farms April 15, 1910—five counties.

County.	Total sheep.	Lambs.	Ewes.	Rams and wethers.
Belmont	93,987	11,340	45,870	36,777
Carroll	73,940	7,216	37,619	29,105
Jefferson	57,291	7,519	29,764	19,518
Harrison	149,704	19,556	67,924	62,224
Monroe	23,423	4,014	12,193	7,216

I have not the time to take up item by item in this bill, while I heartily agree that our committee has placed the schedule on an ad valorem duty as the only proper way to collect this revenue. But I am morally certain that this tariff is not sufficiently high to produce the required revenue on either the manufactured goods or on the raw wool and at the same time to do justice to our industries and producers.

Under section 3 of the proposed act the committee has compiled a statement showing the amount of combed wool or tops, roving, etc., manufactured, etc., at a duty which shall be 25 per cent, and what was imported and the duty thereon for the last year, and showing that they estimate that there will be about 700 times as much imported under section 3 of this act as was imported under the Payne-Aldrich Act, and that the revenue will be increased about 150 times as much. This does not sound good to those who are interested in the production of wool and woolens in this country. This boldly asserts that this vast sum represents just so much foreign labor, withdrawn from and taken away from American industries.

Their summary proposes to receive annually under this bill about $20,000,000 worth of wool more than under the former act.

But the worst feature of the whole matter is that this bill proposes to let in to our ports forty and a half million dollars more annually of woolens than did the former act.

That by reason of this low tariff, almost to a free-trade basis, they propose to flood our country with wool and woolens. This was demonstrated under the Walker tariff law of 1846. I read from the American Tariff Controversies in the Nineteenth Century, volume 2, page 92:

It is not too much to say that the new tariff practically ruined the woolen industry, which had revived and become fairly flourishing under the protection it received under the act of 1842. The ambitious manufacturers of that time began the production of fine broadcloths, which in quality equaled any that were made in the world. But the act of 1846 put an end to the industry. When that tariff went into operation there were 1,800 looms, chiefly in New England, weaving broadcloth. Within a few years every one of them had stopped or had been diverted to the production of an inferior grade of goods. The blanket manufacture also was destroyed. The rate of duty on the coarse wool used in making blankets, which was imported and not produced in the country, was 30 per cent, but the duty on blankets was only 20 per cent. The law therefore operated as a prohibition upon the manufacture. "The only branches of wool manufacture which continued with any great activity were those which, like flannels, were supplied by the common wool of the country, so superior in its spinning qualities as in itself to afford an advantage over the foreign manufacture. There was no longer a demand for any but the common wools, and the Saxony wool industry, which had recently made great progress among the New England farmers, disappeared with the manufacture of fine cloths, which had brought it into existence." All writers agree that the period was one of extreme depression, of disappointment, and disaster. The importations of foreign fabrics of wool increased greatly as the domestic industry declined. The value of woolen manufactures imported in 1846 was $10,000,000; in 1855 it was $22,000,000.

I read again from the same work, at page 308, as to the operation of the Wilson bill. This is evidently compiled with some care and may have a little coloring from a Republican pen, but the facts and statistics remain unchanged.

Inasmuch as the great feature of the then existing tariff was free wool he made much of the disastrous result of the experiment. The importation of wool in 1896 was three times as much as in 1893, and the quantity of woolen manufactures imported was twice as great, yet the revenue from the articles named in the wool schedule was diminished almost one-half—the receipts having been only $23,000,000, a loss of $21,000,000. "In other words," he said, "by placing wool on the free list and reducing the duties on the manufactures of wool the Treasury lost $21,000,000 of revenue, our farmers lost a market for the 80,000,000 pounds of wool which they raised in 1892 in excess of what they raised in 1897–98, as well as nearly 10 cents a pound in price, involving a loss to them of nearly $30,000,000 per annum on this one farm product; and our manufacturers and their workingmen lost a market not only for the goods which foreign imports had supplanted, but also a market for the goods which the farmers and masses of the people were able to purchase in 1893, but which they could not buy in 1896 because of a loss of employment and purchasing power." At the same time, he remarked, it had been demonstrated that free wool did not effect an increase of an exportation of woolen manufactures, but that it had been followed by an increase in the importation of shoddy. Not to discuss the question whether all the evils mentioned were a direct consequence of the wool and woolen schedule in the act of 1894, it seems to be beyond question that some of them were. At all events, it is a fact that during the continuance of that act both wool growing and wool manufacturing suffered more severely than did most industries from the depression of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. FRANCIS. Wright's Wool seems to be the leading work on wool and the wool tariff in this country. At page 299, speaking of the Wilson bill, it says:

Then followed the régime of free wool under the Wilson tariff, together with severe industrial depression, and about two-fifths of the sheep were disposed of. The losses fell heaviest upon the States where sheep had been most numerous, and in some cases amounted to one-half of the flocks.

Now, this extra importation of $20,000,000, as proposed by this bill, paid out by our Government for wool to be supplied to its people, and this forty and a half million of dollars paid for manufactured goods, represents in all sixty and a half million dollars in gold, dipped out of the money of our country and out of circulation and distributed in foreign countries.

But this is not all; this forty and one-half millions of dollars worth of manufactured goods coming into our ports to supply our people represents a labor bestowed thereon of one-half of its value, or twenty and one-half million dollars; this work is to be performed on foreign shores while our workmen stand idly by. Do you know how many laborers employed for a whole year at a monthly salary of $50 this will supplant in the United States? Just 33,750 at the least calculation, at an annual wage of $600. This extra sixty and one-half millions of dollars of imports of wool and woolens will so far crush the wool producer that he will have to abandon his business, and many of his laborers be thrown out of employment, and we will have 100,000 men, women, and children searching for other employment and crowding the other fields of labor in order to obtain a livelihood.

Can the wool producer of our country exist in the face of these duties? If not, we should not enact them, unless we can all agree that he has no right to exist. We should take into consideration, in discussing this question, the standard of American living, wages, education, and citizenship.

The raw wool with which our country competes is chiefly the medium grade of combing wools or the cross breeds of the merino. Those wools are raised on practically free range or on lands valued at from 50 cents to $5 per acre, and where the equable climate requires little or no winter feeding. Much of the wool is grown in Argentina, Bolivia, and in Australia.

Much of the wool which enters into the manufactured cloth and raw wool is grown under the care of a herder who wears a tuft of hair for a hat and a breechclout for a suit of clothes. Are we willing to throw our ports open to this kind of competition?

Due consideration of this question convinces me that any reduction of the woolen schedule should provide for the lowering of the duties upon the manufactured woolens from the present Schedule K; and while this might cut the profits of the combine, it would certainly give a reasonable profit and at the same time reduce the cost to the American people of the garments they have to wear.

Better a reduction of the profit of the manufacturers and lower prices to the laboring man for his clothes, and it is highly proper that this should be accomplished on an ad valorem basis.

I am earnestly in favor of the revision of this tariff in the interest of all the American people, and by the American people, and not in the interests of its beneficiaries—The American Wool Trust. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and the manufactures of wool, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. REYBURN, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence for three weeks, on account of important business.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. HINDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the order heretofore made for eulogies on the memory of the late Hon. AMOS L. ALLEN, a Representative from Maine, be so amended that the time of meeting to-morrow shall be 12.30 o'clock instead of 12 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that the order heretofore adopted fixing the hour of noon to-morrow as the beginning of the session for eulogies on the late Hon. AMOS L. ALLEN, of Maine, be changed to 12.30 o'clock. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

The SPEAKER designated Mr. MCGILLICUDDY to preside at the session to-morrow.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then, on motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow, Sunday, June 11, 1911, at 12.30 p. m.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, June 11, 1911.

The House met at 12.30 o'clock p. m., and was called to order by Mr. MCGILLICUDDY, as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we are assembled here in memory of a departed Member of this House who served his State and Nation with fidelity and ability. Modest, yet firm; without ostentation, yet with patriotic zeal and fervor; a member of a Christian church; zealous in all good works; respected, esteemed, loved by all.

We mourn him, but not as dead; rather as living in another of God's many mansions where, with the same patience, fidelity, and zeal in the service of the King, he is faring on. Help us to emulate his virtues that we may leave behind us a clean record Comfort, we beseech Thee, his colleagues and friends, and let Thine everlasting arms be about those who were near and dear to him in the bonds of kinship to sustain and comfort them; and bring us all in Thine own good time to dwell with Thee in heaven. In the name of Him who is the resurrection and the life. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE ALLEN, OF MAINE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. HINDS, by unanimous consent,

"Ordered, That there be a session of the House on Sunday, June 11, at 12 m., and that the said session be devoted to eulogies on the life, character, and public services of AMOS L. ALLEN, late a Representative from the State of Maine."

Mr. HINDS. Mr. Speaker, before the exercises begin to-day, I ask unanimous consent that Members be allowed to print.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that Members be allowed to print their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HINDS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolutions.

House resolution 201.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. AMOS L. ALLEN, late a Member of this House from the State of Maine.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his distinguished public career, the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The question being taken, the resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. HINDS. Mr. Speaker, when AMOS LAWRENCE ALLEN died in this city on February 20, 1911, he closed a career of 50 years as a public servant. That disposition which Marcus Aurelius saw in his emperor father "to be ever watchful over the things that were necessary for the administration of the empire, and to be a good manager of the expenditure, and patiently to endure the blame which he got for such conduct," existed in its patriotic spirit in this faithful servant of the Republic. He came to the public service in Washington in the direful time of the Civil War, when men of unusual constancy and courage deliberated in these halls. Their example, in the formative years of his early manhood, molded and intensified his political principles, from which he did not deviate as his influence and responsibilities broadened.

Mr. ALLEN was born in Waterboro, in the county of York, Me., March 17, 1837. His father came of the Puritan stock of Massachusetts, his Allen ancestors having arrived from England and settled near Salem in 1640. The father was a farmer, leading an industrious but quiet life. Of those pronounced personal traits which preserve the individuality of a man beyond his generation, he seems to have had a sense of humor and ability as a story teller. These characteristics in the distinguished son are credited to his paternal heritage, while the intellectual abilities and judicious ambition which advanced him among his fellows are credited to the maternal inheritance. His mother was Eleanor Ridley, and was of Revolutionary stock. This, however, was not an especial distinction in the county of York, for that county and its neighbor, Cumberland, took as active a part in the Revolution as the counties of the mother State herself, and their sons made up a large portion of the Massachusetts line.

But Eleanor Ridley had another distinction which could not be shared by all her neighbors, and her wide information, outspoken opinions, and decided convictions, especially on the question of slavery, disposed those who knew her to believe, as the traditions of her family asserted, that she was descended from the kin of the martyr Ridley, who perished at the stake in front of Balliol College, Oxford, in the days of Queen Mary.

There were 10 children in the Allen family, AMOS being the eighth. The father was counted fairly prosperous, but the returns from agriculture in the decade of the forties, either in Waterboro or any other Maine town, were not such as to provide for a large family education beyond that of the schools supported by the town taxes. That the mother selected AMOS from the little flock for the honors of a higher education is proof enough that she discerned in him at that early age the sound common sense and resourcefulness of character which raised him in after life to positions of trust and great usefulness. At the early age of 8 years AMOS was placed with Mr. A. G. Trafton, of the neighboring town of Alfred, a relative who combined the labors of a farmer with kindly ministrations as district schoolmaster. In Alfred the boy remained five years, and this fact, joined to his later career, tells the story of his character. It is hard for any man, impossible for many men, to advance rapidly to positions of trust among the people who have known them in the period of youthful inconsiderateness. But from the day when the child of 8 years went to Alfred for the tutorings of the farmer-schoolmaster that town became the place of his strongest friends and sturdiest support.

With his hard-won college diploma he came back to one of the law offices on the quiet street shaded by the ancient elms that are yet the glory of Alfred; when admitted to the bar he became assistant to the clerk of courts in the courthouse which is still the prized possession of the village; it was with the support of Alfred friends that he launched in 1867, in the then stormy seas of York County politics, his first candidacy for elective office; it was in Alfred that he lived and worked for the 12 years from 1870 to 1882 when he served York County as clerk of courts; it was as a citizen of Alfred and with the unanimous voice of the county of York that he became the Representative of the first congressional district in the House 12 years ago; it was of the anticipated pleasure of returning to his Alfred home that he fondly spoke during the fitful fevers of life's latest hours; and it was to Alfred that his mortal remains were carried to receive the honors of earth's farewell from a generation whose trust in him had been learned from their fathers.

At the end of the five years Mr. Trafton told the mother that the boy had learned all that the Alfred school could teach. So the youth of 13 took farewell—we can believe a reluctant farewell—of the Trafton home, and especially of Mr. Trafton's mother, whose kindness and directing influence Mr. ALLEN in after years acknowledged and repaid with kind attentions, until she passed from life in her hundredth year.

By various employments, of which teaching school was one, the young graduate of the district school of Alfred made enough of financial success to enable him, with the assistance of an older brother in New York City, to enter a seminary at Whitestown, N. Y., in 1853. The training which he there received was undoubtedly good, since he was enabled by it to enter Bowdoin College one year in advance in 1857. But in his later life when those school days were recalled Mr. ALLEN spoke of other things than the studies. New York was then seething with the "irrepressible conflict." Horace Greeley, Wendell Phillips, Salmon P. Chase, Henry Ward Beecher, William H. Seward, and Roscoe Conkling were frequently heard by the students of the seminary. Maine had been an old Democratic State since the rise of Andrew Jackson's star; on the village street of Alfred one of the great houses was the mansion of that John Holmes, first Senator from Maine, who as a member of the triumvirate, "John Holmes, Felix Grundy, and the Devil," was declared by ardent Federalists and Whigs to be one of the presiding geniuses of the Jacksonian Democracy; the Allens in Waterboro were Democrats; and in 1853 it was not a light thing in Maine for a son to turn from the political footsteps of his fathers. But when the boy student, with wide-open, serious eyes, saw Roscoe Conkling, before a tumultuous audience, tear the linen collar from his neck, with the declaration that he felt as if a border ruffian had him by the throat, and then listened for two hours while that superb orator thundered against the great wrong of the age, the glamor of Jackson's name faded, the spell departed from the mansion house of John Holmes, and even what might be thought in the solemn council before the fireplace in the old home at Waterboro seemed for the first time, perhaps, a small matter.

Mr. ALLEN went to Brunswick in 1857 and became a member of the class of 1860 in Bowdoin College. Of the college which he then entered and the brotherhood of young men which he then joined I feel tempted to say more than this day's time will allow. President Woods was one of the most accomplished scholars and gentlemen of the time, honored in Europe as in America. Trained in the old classical school, he had conversed familiarly with the Pope in the Latin tongue. Uniting the dexterity of one taught in the old farm home of America to the training of a courtier, he had in the family circle of the French Emperor held the yarn skein for the crochet work of the young princesses while he conversed with their elders in the tongue of the court. He was great enough to differ with his times and to differ wrongly; but Bowdoin College was also great enough to look with dignity and composure on her president sitting as secretary of the Democratic convention in 1864 to declare the war a failure, and her Prof. Chamberlain leading gloriously on battle fields red with the blood of her sons.

Of that brotherhood of youth in the class of 1860 I could wish that another might speak, one who was with it and of it; perhaps Samuel T. Came, the classmate and neighbor in Alfred, who still practices the law through the evening of a useful life; perhaps Joseph W. Symonds, learned judge of the Supreme Court of Maine, who, at the unveiling of the statue in Portland last summer portrayed the youth of Thomas B. Reed as the class of 1860 knew it; perhaps William W. Thomas, who went to Sweden with the commission of Abraham Lincoln and there lives in honor near the court where he was accredited so long.

If I could re-create the past I would bring back one of the rare days in the Speakership of Thomas B. Reed, when Augustine Jones, honored head of the Friends' School at Providence, would come into the little room off the lobby of this House, which was then the Speaker's room. The great Speaker would lay aside the public business, the faithful secretary, he whose life and services we eulogize to-day, would lay aside his pen, and Bowdoin College and the days of 1860 would have the floor. They would speak of famous professors like Cleveland and Packard, of beloved classmates and companions, both the living and the dead. At times they recalled again the memory of Samuel Fessenden, the son of William Pitt Fessenden, who perished in one of the early battles of the war, who had been

Thomas B. Reed's roommate, and who had interested the great Senator to lend to the poor but earnest boy the assistance that enabled the future Speaker to graduate with the class of 1860. Samuel Fessenden was of the class of 1861. But the class of 1860, like every class of that time, had its share of youths who led companies, regiments, or batteries at ages which now are not considered adequate to the minor responsibilities of peace. Albert W. Bradbury had won the approbation of Sheridan as an officer of artillery on the fields about Winchester, and John Marshall Brown brought home rank and honor from battles as famous.

The relationship of AMOS L. ALLEN and Thomas B. Reed in the class of 1860 exercised a great influence on the lives of both and on the political history of Maine for the generation in which they lived. They had been friendly, but not especially intimate during college days, and when they had delivered their graduating parts—they both stood high in rank—and parted at the college gates, they had no reason to believe that the future held much in common for them. Mr. ALLEN went to the law office of Judge Henry Goodenow, in Alfred, and through Judge Goodenow's interest with Lot M. Morrill, then a Senator from Maine, to a clerkship in the Treasury Department at Washington, where there would be opportunity during leisure hours for study in the Columbian Law School. Mr. Reed went to a Portland law office, thence to California, where he was admitted to the bar, and then to the United States Navy for the closing years of the war. Mr. ALLEN was admitted to the York County bar in 1866, and the next year was Republican candidate for clerk of courts. When his Democratic opponent was elected, he returned to Washington to a position in the post office of the House of Representatives; but in 1870 was in Alfred again, and this time a successful candidate for clerk of courts. In this position of dignity and trust Mr. ALLEN remained 12 years.

Mr. Reed meanwhile had returned to Portland, had served in both branches of the State legislature, and had been attorney general of the State. It was with these honors back of him that he presented himself in the office of his classmate one day in 1876 and stated his ambition to serve the first congressional district in Congress.

The Congressman at that time was a distinguished citizen of York County, a man of large business interests and extensive political influence. He had, moreover, the loyal and determined support of a large portion of York County. Mr. Reed came from the other county of the district. Mr. ALLEN undoubtedly saw the political embarrassments of the situation, but he cast his fortunes with his classmate and was one of the small band of men from York County who assisted in Mr. Reed's nomination in a contest so close and exciting that the memories of it still live in Maine.

Mr. Reed came to this House, and in 1882 he was named chairman of the Judiciary Committee by Speaker Keifer. He at once nominated his classmate and friend as clerk, and Mr. ALLEN served the committee during the Forty-seventh Congress. With the return of a Democratic majority in the Forty-eighth Congress Mr. Reed ceased to be chairman, and Mr. ALLEN, after a year as special examiner in the Pension Bureau, returned to Alfred in 1886 and was at once elected to the Maine Legislature.

It was during this session of the legislature, which convened January 1, 1887, that I first met Mr. ALLEN. He was not obtrusive in the proceedings of that body, rarely participated in the debates, and for a time passed with spectators as one of the quiet, sensible body of farmer members who from the origin of the State have wasted little time, but have voted potentially in the legislatures of Maine. But education, experience of affairs, common sense, and industry never fail to come to their own in any legislative body, and before the winter was over the modest gentleman from Alfred found his judgment sought by the leaders and his opinions respected by the membership.

The national election of 1888 brought a Republican to the White House and a Republican majority to this Hall. Mr. Reed had been 12 years a Member, and now came forward for the Speakership. In the moment of his success he turned again to his college classmate, and Mr. ALLEN became his secretary.

The older Members on this floor will remember the quiet, judicious secretary, whom they always found unperturbed at his post during the stormy years of Mr. Reed's speakerships. He was not merely a secretary, he was a friend and counselor. It would be as easy to contemplate John Milton, secretary to Oliver Cromwell, in the condition of a mere transcriber of dictations, as to contemplate AMOS L. ALLEN busying himself only with opening letters and copying answers. So much political sagacity, so great calmness of judgment, so evident honesty of purpose, never passed unappreciated or unused in the council chamber of Thomas B. Reed. I first saw the two men together in the winter of 1890, in the midst of the tumultuous first session of the Fifty-first Congress; and 20 years have not dimmed the vivid recollections of the loyalty and trust subsisting in the daily relations of the two men.

When Mr. Reed resigned, in 1899, his membership in the House, the first district of Maine, which for 22 years had thought of no other for her Representative, turned to Mr. ALLEN naturally, and with practical unanimity so far as the dominant political party was concerned. He was chosen at a special election by a substantial majority, and thereafter continued in the approval of the district for 12 years.

And when, before the choice of 1910 was to be made, he announced voluntarily his purpose to retire, the general good will and appreciation expressed for his faithful service promised that he would carry to private life the unique dignity of a man who had outlived the animosities of political strife while still remaining in it. That he should take leave of life before entering the peaceful retirement which seemed so attractive to him and to which he looked forward with so many anticipations brought to his friends the only disappointment in his long public career.

Mr. ALLEN'S place as a servant of the people of Maine has been fixed by the officially expressed confidence of her public men and the voice of the people themselves. His place in this House is not written so broadly in the records as in the case of many other Members. His modesty led him to shun debate, and he never sought to place himself in a high seat at the council table. But in the future, when other men shall be in this Hall and some are anxious to know the record of AMOS LAWRENCE ALLEN, they will find by his recorded votes and acts that he served in his day and generation with diligence, honesty, and courage.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, because of my absence from Washington I was only yesterday afternoon advised that the solemn observance upon which we are now engaged would occur to-day, and I have had, therefore, no opportunity for that suitable preparation so necessary to render eulogy appropriate and seasonable. But I loved AMOS L. ALLEN, and I can not allow to remain unembraced this occasion to offer my inadequate tribute to his memory.

We are assembled in this historic Chamber on this sacred day to consider resolutions which will be unanimously adopted at the conclusion of these impressive ceremonies. We are here to express our appreciation of a life which all approved and to evidence our bereavement in a death which all deplored.

I did not enjoy a prolonged or intimate acquaintance with Mr. ALLEN. When I entered the Sixty-first Congress I was assigned to the Committee on Indian Affairs, where I was introduced to the subject of this imperfect memorial, then an influential member of that important committee. I was attracted to him immediately, as all were who knew him at all, by his gentle courtesy, by his quiet dignity, by his modest demeanor, by his obvious sincerity, by his patient industry, by his inflexible integrity, and by his exceptional efficiency for the performance of the duties which devolved upon him. As, in the lapse of time, I was admitted more informally into the privileges of his friendship, I grew more and more to recognize his unusual ability, which I think was scarcely understood here, and more and more to reverence his admirable character, which I am sure was acknowledged everywhere. He was born of obscure and honest parentage on March 17, 1837, and died an American Representative, commanding the confidence and good will of an intelligent and enlightened constituency, on February 13, 1911. His life was singularly busy and remarkably useful. His early career was characterized by a constant struggle for an education which should equip him for the serious and severe labors of the world. He always underestimated his own capacity, and he was one of the most unassuming men I ever encountered in official or private station. Fortunately for his district, for his State, for his country, his people were not slow to discover his extraordinary aptitude for the public service, and almost from his youth to his death he occupied some position of trust or responsibility or distinction or honor. It can be truthfully said of him—and more need not be said of any man—that he retired from every relation with the esteem and love of those whose interests his activities affected.

We know how uniform was the affection cherished for him by his colleagues in the House, and how general was their regret when his decease was announced. With a profounder intensity the same affection was displayed and the same regret suffered by his humbler neighbors in Maine. I was extremely impressed by the funeral oration delivered at Alfred by his old pastor, the Rev. C. W. Bradlee, of Bath, Me., and I undertake now to reproduce it as a part of my remarks:

Life is a constant revelation. To the open eye every moment is luminous. But there are critical periods in human lives, seasons of special revelation. A strange path has opened at our feet. Some great blessing has come into our lives and flooded our souls with sunshine and hope. Or some sorrow has fallen upon us and so changed everything that we walk in a different world and seem to be different men and women. Most of us understand this truth. Life has been filled with varied experiences, joyous and sad. We have been called again and again to walk along darkened ways, needing sorely the comfort of others, where at other times it has been ours to comfort. We have met experiences which seemed uncertain and unreal. We have passed a rugged corner in life. Our outlook has changed, and we have changed with it. Thus are we brought into sympathy with the trying lot of others, and in the darkest hours hands are held out to those in need. Because we have passed through the loneliness and weariness of affliction, we are touched most deeply by the affliction of others. And so we are here, this large company of men and women, in the middle of a busy day, heart to heart, soul to soul, with this bereft circle. Practical sympathy has been and will be shown; but now we are gathered to express, if only by our presence and in silent communion, the yearning desire we each and all have to console and comfort and bless. Human speech seems almost an intrusion in an hour like this—the ministry of spirit, human and divine, is more appropriate and eloquent. Yet I would, if I may, voice the feelings of those present and absent who were friends of the departed. I would also be a minister of consolation this hour, and the more because of the sympathetic and personal relation existing between myself and family and this shadowed home. It is not easy for me to speak here this afternoon.

The departure of this man, whose body lies here in the stillness, brings to me and mine a sense of personal bereavement and loss. I am, indeed, a mourner at his bier. For more than 30 years I was honored with and enjoyed his friendship. Our acquaintance began in 1878, when I became his pastor. And what a royal parishioner he was! Not only a liberal contributor toward the expenses of public worship; not only a constant attendant and inspiring listener to my youthful preaching, but ready to cooperate with me in every worthy enterprise for the people's good. I saw much of him during those two years, both in public and private, and came to know him intimately. I was made welcome in his home and have enjoyed its hospitality at my will ever since. But he opened his heart to me, and I learned what manner of man this was, who, honored so far above the majority of his fellows, remained ingenuous and unostentatious to the last. It is not necessary that I repeat the biographical facts which have been published in all the leading papers of the country. His public life is well known by you who sit before me. Neither am I expected to attempt a memorial oration, such as will doubtless be delivered at a future day by some colleague at Washington. But mine is the humbler privilege of offering a simple, affectionate tribute from my heart to the memory of this man, whom I greatly respected and genuinely loved. It was good to have him for a friend. You know that. How genial he was. His laugh was infectious. How companionable and sympathetic. He shared your joys and sorrows. He helped you when he could. His friendship was true. It could be depended upon; it never betrayed its trust. That made him an ideal member of the fraternity to which he belonged. He not only took the vows of brotherhood, but practiced the spirit of brotherliness and the law of mutual help.

But he not only loved his neighbor and recognized the brotherhood of men, but he loved his country. He was patriotic as well as philanthropic. He was a conscientious public servant. He was true and faithful in every relation of life—devoted to his family, kind to his relatives, and a friend in need to many who were of no relation to him. He was as generous as tender-hearted and liked to bestow his benefactions secretly. Though plain-spoken and unaffected, he was a courteous gentleman, showing deference to the aged and attracting the young around him. He was charitable of men's motives and disposed to put the best construction on their words and actions. He had decided convictions on every moral question, and I never knew him to hesitate to declare them when a declaration of his standing was called for. I have talked with him alone of the eternal verities. He was a believer in the Christian religion and had a personal faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. The other world and life seemed to him a logical sequence of this world and life. Though a quiet man, he was one of strong feelings. With his intense nature he must have seen and heard and felt more than the ordinary man in this world. What must it have been to him when he found himself so suddenly in yonder world of God? A retired captain of the British Army, fond of relating his world-wide experiences, he was describing some of his most surprising adventures, when, stopping suddenly in the midst of his stories, he exclaimed, with emotion and solemn earnestness: "But, gentlemen, wonderful as these things were, I am expecting soon to see something far more wonderful." The company were much surprised and mystified at this sudden exclamation and altered manner. The veteran soldier was 70 years old, and as he was retired from service and his traveling days were over, they wondered what he could mean. When they asked his meaning he was silent for a moment and then replied: "During the first five minutes after death."

May we not believe that not only was that a great wonder, but a sweet surprise, to this our friend who has preceded us on the unknown journey. However much one has thought about and prepared for and expected it, unspeakably wonderful must it be to suddenly find oneself in the other and better world. The other day when the message came he heard the call of the unseen that those around him could not hear, and went over. He did not die. Out from the cast-off tenement of flesh he went to God. Out from the night of earth he passed into the eternal morning, to the land of the unclouded day, where the Lord's tired ones rest and are never sick any more, nor worn, nor weary, nor ever know again the heartaches of earth life, for "God shall spread His tabernacle over them. They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat, for the lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them and shall lead them unto fountains of waters, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes."

His daughter, in a personal communication to a friend of the family, said: "His ability to serve others and keep silent was one of his strongest points. His sudden death revealed to us many secrets of his being a 'friend in need' to many. I would not wish to multiply words as to my father's true worth, but I know that whatever estimate is put on his public career he was a faithful public servant, honest and sincere in every act." And his son: "As I look at his life it was one of serviceableness in the best sense of the word."

And from far off Mississippi a gentleman writes: "In my Dixie home I shall teach my children to reverence the memory of the man who once helped their father in time of sore need."

Service! Mr. Speaker, it is the principle inculcated by the great Master who surrendered his life on Calvary to illustrate it. Service! It was finely exemplified by our departed friend, and we know beyond all doubting truly that when he crossed to the invisible shore his devoted soul was immediately admitted to companionship with the spirits of other just men made perfect on high.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, during my short service in this body I have been greatly impressed by the very happy custom of setting apart a day for eulogizing deceased Members. I hope the custom will long survive. While it is a pretty tribute to the dead, I regard it as being of especial value to those who participate in such occasions. A tender regard for the memory of the departed ones has ever been the source of inspiration to the survivors. A history of the sacrifices made by the living in memory of the dead would fill volumes; and in the making of these sacrifices their lives were idealized and they were lifted up above their grosser selves.

Numberless institutions of great value to society have been founded and maintained for the benefit of helpless youth and equally helpless age as monuments to loved ones who prematurely fell before the sickle of the grim reaper. Many institutions devoted to the education of persons who were poor but worthy, many beautiful temples dedicated to the worship of the Living God, exist to-day as testimonials of affection for wife or husband, for son or daughter, who had crossed to that "bourn whence no traveler returns."

Some of the most stupendous works of the ancients—works so colossal as to practically defy the defacing hand of time—were erected by the living in tender recollection of the dead.

The monuments left by the Mound Builders of North America, the great pyramids of Egypt, and many other stupendous undertakings of the primeval races show to what extreme lengths they went to keep fresh and green the memory of their departed.

And in the world of art and letters it were very difficult to tell what we owe to this most commendable sentiment.

Chateaubriand's great book, The Genius of Christianity, is but a monument which, by her open grave, he resolved to build in loving memory of his mother, in partial atonement for a past life which had been a source of great grief to her. And the same might be said of that other wonderful book, The Confessions of St. Augustine, whose good mother, Monica, devoted much time to praying for her son's conversion. And it is common knowledge that the Divine Comedy, the greatest flight of the human imagination, is but the tribute of love which Dante paid to the memory of his beloved Beatrice. There is scarcely a limit to the cases of this character which might be cited. Nor are we without an illustration here. You will remember but a short few years ago our distinguished colleague, HENRY GEORGE, jr., visited the late Count Tolstoy at his home in Russia.

The great Russian, like most thoughtful men, was an admirer of Mr. GEORGE's father.

Anticipating his own approaching death he said: "What message shall I bring from you to your father?" And the son, whom I have almost learned to love, sent to the father, whom I had the honor to know and respect and admire, this simple message: "Tell him I am doing the work."

What work was this he is doing? The work of humanity. The work of making less heavy the burdens of those who labor and are heavy laden. And those who read his splendid book, The Menace of Privilege, can read between the lines on every page how the living son has dedicated himself to the work begun by his distinguished father, and how the memory of the dead father acts as an inspiration to the surviving son.

I think I am not in error when I say that the feeling is almost universal among men, whether civilized or savage, that in the great beyond there will be a continued existence and a renewal of association or communion between individuals in spite of death.

The great agnostic, Col. Ingersoll, seems to have recognized this universal feeling and attempted to explain it away by saying that "hope hears the rustle of a wing." By the word "hope," as he uses it, Col. Ingersoll undoubtedly intended to convey not the Christian hope, but a mere foundationless wish or desire.

But was it such hope that induced the American aborigines to slay the dead warrior's pony and, with his bow and arrows, bury it beside his body to keep him company and to serve him in the happy hunting ground?

Was it such a hope that induced them to place the bodies of their dead on elevated platforms to prevent their mutilation, that they might not suffer any inconvenience or humiliation among their fellows in the great beyond?

Was it such a hope that impelled them to suffer death rather than lose the precious scalp lock, so necessary to their proper standing in the life so surely awaiting them beyond the grave? What did they know of hope in the Christian sense, apart from that innate feeling implanted in the breasts of all men?

So far as I am aware, the uncivilized and even savage races everywhere believe in a life after this one, in some instances, however, believing that existence in the hereafter depends upon the preservation of the physical body.

Herbert Spencer, the great agnostic philosopher, admits the universality of this belief in a future life, and tried to explain it away by giving what seems to me a ridiculously insufficient reason. In substance he says that when primitive men observed cases of swooning or suspended animation they reached the conclusion that each individual had in him an "other self," which "other self" had the power to leave the body temporarily and take, as it were, an occasional vacation, and that death was but the indefinite absence of this "other self." He virtually admits the fact of this universal belief, but his explanation of the origin of it is rather far-fetched and laborious. A common origin of mankind, with traditions traceable to a common source, and an inward, insatiable longing for existence furnish a far better explanation.

It seems to me the well-known customs of the primitive races, to some of which I have alluded, are a sufficient contradiction of Mr. Spencer's theory.

It is safe to say that the desire for happiness is universal among normal men. Even when we go furthest wrong we are but striving after happiness, although guided by a perverted judgment. So, also, the desire to be, to exist, is universal; and this desire to exist is so strong that I can not conceive of happiness for one who was convinced that he was a brother to the clod, that his very existence might terminate at any moment.

The dread of utter annihilation would inevitably render him most unhappy. But why? My answer to that query is, Because God made him that way; because there is planted deep in the foundations of his nature, far deeper than he can fathom, a yearning, an unconquerable desire to continue to exist.

The poet Milton well expresses this thought when he says:

> For who would lose,
> Tho' filled with pain, this intellectual being;
> These thoughts that wander through eternity,
> To perish rather, swallowed up and lost
> In the wide womb of uncreated night?

In the play of Cato, Addison represents that stern old Roman as brooding over his misfortunes and contemplating suicide. He is seated at a table. He has been reading Plato's book on the Immortality of the Soul. His sword, unsheathed, lies beside him ready for use in what was to be the last act of life's drama. But his purpose is shaken by what he has read. He is convinced by the reasoning of the great philosopher, and in discussing the question with himself, he thus soliloquizes:

> It must be so. Plato, thou reasonest well,
> Else why this pleasing hope, this fond desire,
> This longing after immortality?
> Or whence this secret dread and inward horror
> Of falling into naught? Why shrinks the soul
> Back on herself, and startles at destruction?
> 'Tis the Divinity that stirs within us;
> 'Tis Heaven itself that points out an hereafter
> And intimates eternity to man.
> Eternity, thou pleasing, dreadful thought!

And then he sees that while the sword may kill the body it can not reach the soul, and he adds:

> The soul secure in her existence
> Smiles at the drawn dagger
> And defies its point.
> The stars shall fade away,
> The sun himself grow dim with age,
> And nations sink in years, but thou
> Shalt flourish in immortal youth, unhurt
> Amid the war of elements, the wreck
> Of matter, and the crush of worlds.

In his own beautifully simple and characteristic way our Longfellow says:

> Dust thou art, to dust returneth,
> Was not spoken of the soul.

No; death does not end all. Death is but the real beginning of all. It is but the gateway through which we are to pass from time to eternity.

I know—

Said Job nearly 4,000 years ago—

> I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that in the last day I shall rise out of the earth, and I shall be clothed with my skin, and in my flesh I shall see God.

What faith and what consolation is represented by these words! And it was in such firm belief as this that our late colleague, Mr. AMOS L. ALLEN, lived and died.

As one of a committee on the part of the House, I accompanied his remains to their last resting place at Alfred, Me., in the same county in which he was born 74 years ago, and in which his permanent home was during all these years.

No higher tribute could be paid to his memory and his character than the genuine and truly touching exhibition of mingled sorrow and respect shown by the friends and neighbors of a lifetime on the funeral occasion.

My personal acquaintance with Mr. ALLEN was limited to our association in the Committee on Indian Affairs during the Sixty-first Congress, supplemented by occasional meetings on the floor of the House.

But, limited and brief as these opportunities were, I formed a high opinion of his sterling honesty, his fine integrity, and I soon learned to have the greatest respect for his judgment and the highest esteem for him personally.

But the final summons came to him, and he had to answer it, just as it will in time come to each of us, and each, in his turn, will have to answer it.

Silently and sorrowfully we bore what was mortal of him to his last resting place in the silent city of the dead, God's acre. We left his dust in its lonely prison house on the hillside in the State of his nativity; and then we turned our faces again to the problems we are trying to solve, and which we must continue to work at till life's fitful fever passes for us, also. When that time comes may some one be able to truthfully say for us, as I believe I can truthfully say for him, that we met and discharged life's duties honestly and bravely, that we were willing to stand for the right even though we stood alone, that we tried earnestly to serve our country and our fellow men, and that the world is at least a little better because we lived in it.

Mr. RUBEY assumed the chair.

Mr. McGILLICUDDY. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with a long and honored custom in this House, we meet to-day to pay our tribute to the dead.

It is especially fitting that in this House, the scene of the last labors of his useful life, the character and career of AMOS LAWRENCE ALLEN should be commemorated.

He was eminently worthy of the high honor we now pay to his memory.

If it is given to those gone beyond to know something of this mortal life, I am sure that it would be his wish that no word of extravagant praise or fulsome eulogy should be spoken on this occasion. He was a plain-spoken, truthful, sincere, and modest man. He indeed valued appreciation, but caressing speech and undue compliment were especially distasteful to him.

While his successful career was principally due to his own efforts, yet there were elements that contributed largely to it over which he had no control, and I have no doubt that it would be his wish on this occasion that these elements rather than his own efforts should be the subject of his eulogy.

In the first place, he came of good stock. His ancestors were of the type of those who, in the middle of the seventeenth century, left England for the new western world with the spirit of freedom in their hearts. On the sturdy soil of America they developed into Revolutionary patriots of the type of yeomanry that at Lexington and Concord fired the shot that was heard around the world. His great grandfather fought in that giant struggle, and at its close moved to York County, Me., where AMOS L. ALLEN was born March 17, 1837. His mother was a woman of unusual ability, of strong character and convictions, a woman who was not only a worker, but a thinker, and upon the boy she reared fixed the impress of her thought and character, which remained with him to the day of his death.

In another respect was he fortunate; he was born poor. I do not mean that he was in want and poverty, but in circumstances and conditions that teach lessons and fix habits of frugality, thrift, and industry.

Again was he fortunate in being born and reared on a farm—the best place in this world to bring up an American boy, because there, as nowhere else, he early learns practical lessons of duty and responsibility.

One of Mr. ALLEN'S earliest traits was his desire for an education. To improve his mind was a passion. Good books were his early and close companions. After acquiring such education as his vicinity afforded he went away to earn money to still further pursue his studies. A liberal education was his early ambition, and he had the proud satisfaction of fulfilling that ambition when he graduated from Bowdoin College with high honor in the class of 1860.

He studied law and became an honored member of the bar of his native county of York in 1866.

He was early recognized by his fellow citizens as a man of worth and ability, and was elected by them to many positions of honor and trust, all of which he filled with fidelity and ability. As has been truly said, this period of his life was one of serviceableness and usefulness in the best sense of the word.

The crowning work of Mr. ALLEN'S career was in this National House of Representatives. It is not my purpose, however, to even briefly advert to it. This has been faithfully done by his colaborers here. I rise simply to state that it is my privilege and pleasure on this occasion, as a citizen of his State and a member of the opposite political party, to record my belief that no matter how men might differ with him in principle or on matters of public policy, AMOS L. ALLEN was universally considered an honest and honorable man of deep and sincere convictions, who in the discharge of his public duties did what he believed to be right as it was given to him to see the right.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, death is no respecter of persons or of age; all must answer when the summons comes. When one stands beside the bier of youth imagination brings to view the possibilities and triumphs of a life that might have been had these tender years budded into manhood. The tear of sorrow, mingled with regret, moistens the cheek, and it is hard to understand why one so young should be taken. There is a feeling of personal loss that fills the heart.

When in the full vigor of manhood, with courage and determination to do for home and brother and country, our friend is stricken by the hand of death, one stands appalled by the loss and is impelled to exclaim, "Why this tragedy of life?" The foundation of life's structure has been well laid, the superstructure of social and business responsibility is building, and there is bright promise of a completed whole—a truly successful life that the world can ill afford to do without. But the summons comes; the architect is laid low; and as one stands by the open grave there is grief, not alone for what might have been, but because our eyes have seen what has been done and our hearts have felt the throb of a kindly heart. Life's structure, it seems, is left unfinished and the plans have been lost with the death of the builder.

But does the reaper, Death, spare the life until the mellowing years have matured its fruit; until in the ripeness and fullness of age it has given to mankind the blessing of a noble life, full of good works and good words, and then full of years—threescore years and ten, and then four years more—in the full vigor of mind, garner the ripened grain—take our friend from labor on earth to the reward beyond? Then, as one stands by the bier, the tears of sorrow will, indeed, flow in the sadness of farewell; but mingled with the sorrow there is the balm that our friend has lived, truly lived; that he has been our friend and that his help has enriched the life that is ours.

There is grief because of the loss and the parting, but still one feels that the friendship still lives in the heart and memory; that the life is richer and fuller because of that friendship; that the world is brighter and better because our friend has lived.

As I stood by the bier of our deceased colleague these are some of the thoughts that came crowding in on my mind.

AMOS LAWRENCE ALLEN, my friend, your friend, was born March 17, 1837, in Waterboro, Me., and died February 20, 1911, in this city, where until a few days before his decease he was active in the discharge of his duties as the Representative of his district. I will not go into detail regarding the activities of his business and political life. Others who knew him longer can do this better than I can, and I will leave it to them. However, let me say in passing, that during his long life he was always found ready to do his duty, whatever that duty might be, in any capacity in which he was placed.

As one of the Members who escorted the body of the deceased to his former home in Alfred, Me., I had the pleasure of meeting many of his former townsmen. The love and respect and esteem that was manifested by these people who knew him best—by his friends and neighbors—touched me very deeply. He was their Congressman, but he was more than that. He was their trusted friend and neighbor; he was Uncle AMOS to them, and the tears dimmed the eyes of many with whom I talked as they recounted the kind words and deeds of him whom they had learned to love.

How grand a thing is life when it is truly lived, and how sublime to live on in the hearts and lives of friends even though separated by death.

Life is measured not so much by heartbeats as by kind sympathies; not so much by dollars as by good deeds; not so much by political preferment as by sterling honesty; and measured by these standards our deceased colleague indeed lived, and his life is worthy of our emulation.

It was my privilege to sit with him as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and it was here that I learned to admire him and to know his true worth. His rugged manhood and unfailing kindness of disposition won him high esteem among his colleagues. He firmly believed that the highest duty of a public servant was to obey the wishes of the people. He was courteous and kind to all; genial and companionable; would rejoice with a friend in his success, and extend sympathy to one in sorrow or misfortune; and the joy or the sympathy came from the heart and found the heart. Here was a good man, and I esteem his friendship as one of the rich memories that will always be associated with my membership in this body.

In closing, I wish to quote a passage from the eulogy delivered by the Rev. C. W. Bradlee, a long-time friend and former pastor of the late Congressman, on the occasion of the funeral service of the deceased:

He was true and faithful in every relation of life—devoted to his family, kind to his relatives, and a friend in need to many who were of no relation to him. He was as generous as tender-hearted, and liked to bestow his benefactions secretly. Though plain-spoken and unaffected, he was a courteous gentleman—showing deference to the aged and attracting the young around him. He was charitable of men's motives and disposed to put the best construction on their actions. He had decided convictions on every moral question and was a believer in the Christian religion. The other world and life seemed to him a logical sequence of this world and life.

To know AMOS ALLEN was to love him, and of no man could we more truthfully say—

His life was gentle; and the elements
So mix't in him that Nature might stand up
And say to all the world, "This was a man."

ADJOURNMENT.

Then, in accordance with the resolution heretofore adopted (at 1 o'clock and 44 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until Monday, June 12, 1911, at 12 o'clock m.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 8th instant, a statement showing the amount paid for the various parcels of land comprising the site for the proposed buildings for the Departments of State, Commerce and Labor, and Justice, together with a statement showing the names of lessees, amount of rent received, etc., which, on motion of Mr. HEYBURN, was, with the accompanying papers, ordered to lie on the table and be printed. (S. Doc. No. 46.)

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, transmitted to the Senate resolutions on the life and public services of Hon. AMOS L. ALLEN, late a Representative from the State of Maine.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, relative to the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution providing for the initiative, the referendum, and the recall in relation to Federal legislation and officials, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (J. Res. 43, S.) memorializing Congress to take proper steps toward a constitutional amendment providing for initiative, referendum, and recall.

Whereas the principle involved in the initiative, the referendum, and the recall is thoroughly democratic and American; and

Whereas the American people have repeatedly evidenced their desire to have an opportunity to voice their sentiments through these forms of expression: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That we respectfully memorialize the Congress of the United States speedily to take such steps as will result in the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the initiative, the referendum, and the recall in relation to Federal legislation and officials; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing be immediately transmitted by the secretary of state to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of the Senators and Representatives from this State.

THOMAS MORRIS,
President of the Senate.
C. A. INGRAM,
Speaker of the Assembly.
F. M. WYLIE,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, relative to the organization of a Territorial form of government for Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (J. Res. 48, S.) memorializing Congress to grant to Alaska a Territorial form of government.

Whereas the Territory of Alaska has recently developed into a Territory of great wealth settled by a large number of worthy residents, mostly Americans, whose number is constantly increasing; and

Whereas industrial and social conditions there existent have suffered from the absence of a legislative body therein: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Congress of the United States be respectfully memorialized promptly to take such steps as may be necessary to provide for the organization of a Territorial legislature in Alaska, to be representative of the American citizenship there resident, with such powers and limitations as have usually been given to and imposed upon legislative assemblies in other Territories of the Nation; and be it

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each Member of Congress and to each United States Senator representing this State, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the President of the United States.

THOMAS MORRIS,
President of the Senate.
C. A. INGRAM,
Speaker of the Assembly.
F. M. WYLIE,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, requesting that a convention of the several States be called for the purpose of proposing certain amendments to the Constitution of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (J. Res. 15, S.) relating to national constitutional convention.

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, in accordance with the provisions of Article V of the Constitution of the United States, desires to join with the other States of the Union, and respectfully request that a convention of the several States be called for the purpose of proposing amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and hereby apply to and request the Congress of the United States to call such convention, and to provide for the submitting to the several States the amendments so proposed for ratification by the legislatures thereof, or by convention therein, as one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress.

SEC. 2. That the secretary of state is hereby directed to transmit certified copies of this joint resolution and application to both Houses of the United States Congress, to the governor of each State in the Union, to the honorable Representatives and Senators in Congress from Wisconsin, who are hereby requested and urged to aid by their influence and vote, to the end that the provision of section 1 of this joint resolution be carried out.

THOMAS MORRIS,
President of the Senate.
C. A. INGRAM,
Speaker of the Assembly.
F. M. WYLIE,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, relative to the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution providing that the Constitution may hereafter be amended by the initiative, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (J. Res. 42, S.) memorializing Congress to take proper steps for the adoption of an amendment to the Federal Constitution providing that such Constitution may hereafter be amended by the initiative.

Whereas the Constitution of the United States should be rendered somewhat flexible in order to meet changing political and economic conditions; and

Whereas the amendment of such Constitution by the initiative is a method founded upon thoroughly democratic and American principles: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That we respectfully memorialize the Congress of the United States promptly to take such steps as will result in the adoption of an amendment to the Federal Constitution providing that such Constitution may hereafter be amended by the initiative; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing be immediately transmitted by the Secretary of State to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of the Senators and Representatives from this State.

THOMAS MORRIS,
President of the Senate.
C. A. INGRAM,
Speaker of the Assembly.
F. M. WYLIE,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, relative to the issuance of passports by the United States Government, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (J. Res. 79, A.) memorializing Congress in regard to passports issued by the United States Government.

Whereas the Government of Russia refuses, at the present time, to recognize passports issued by the United States Government to certain citizens thereof, particularly those of Jewish birth; and

Whereas it is the solemn duty of the Government of this Nation to protect all of its citizens, regardless of birth or creed, while sojourning in foreign countries and within their legal rights; and

Whereas many of the aforesaid American citizens are made the victims of the most barbarous and inhuman treatment at the hands of the Russian Government: Therefore be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That we respectfully memorialize Congress to take such steps as they see fit to compel the Russian Government to recognize the passports issued by the Government of this Nation to its citizens, and to protect their rights as citizens in all cases; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing be immediately transmitted, by the secretary of state, to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of the Senators and Representatives from this State.

C. A. INGRAM,
Speaker of the Assembly.
THOMAS MORRIS,
President of the Senate.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
F. M. WYLIE,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (J. Res. 125, A) memorializing Congress to grant to the State of Wisconsin the Oneida Indian School.

Whereas the lands of the Oneida Indian Reservation, near the city of De Pere, Wis., have been allotted to the individual persons residing upon said reservation; and

Whereas the school maintained upon said reservation is no longer of value to the Indian Service: Therefore be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That Congress be respectfully requested to grant to the State of Wisconsin, to be used as an institution of learning, the Oneida Indian School maintained upon the above-mentioned reservation; be it further

Resolved, That a certified copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Chief Clerks of the two Houses of Congress.

C. A. INGRAM,
Speaker of the Assembly.
THOMAS MORRIS,
President of the Senate.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
F. M. WYLIE,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

He also presented a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (J. Res. 123, A.) relating to the sending into any State of money or campaign literature in violation of the corrupt-practice law of that State.

Whereas the State of Wisconsin, as well as many other States, has acted in conformity with the progressive thought of the time in passing laws designed to limit corruption at elections, indiscriminate campaign expenditures, and the power of money in politics; and

Whereas all national political parties have pledged the enactment of legislation which will place a strict control on election expenses with a view of purifying both national and State elections; and

Whereas the States are without power to prevent or control the sending in of money or literature from without the State to control or influence State elections, and for this reason must rely upon the cooperation of Congress in its efforts to preserve the purity of elections, and to limit the indiscriminate use of money in politics: Therefore be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That our Representatives in Congress are hereby requested to use their best efforts to secure such congressional legislation as will effectively preclude the sending into any State of money or campaign literature in violation of the spirit of the corrupt-practice law of that State. That in order to determine the sources of all campaign literature sent into any State through the mails or by interstate commerce, the persons sending such literature shall be required to submit to the postal authorities a copy of each political paper, circular, or pamphlet sent into such State, together with a statement of the amount of such literature sent, and the names and addresses of the persons paying for the same; and that our Representatives in Congress be further requested to make every effort to secure as complete cooperation as possible between the National and State Governments, that the purity of both national and State elections may be assured.

C. A. INGRAM,
Speaker of the Assembly.
THOMAS MORRIS,
President of the Senate.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
F. M. WYLIE,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. STEPHENSON presented a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (J. Res. 15, A.) relating to the Sherman antitrust law.

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That our United States Senators and our Representatives are requested to introduce an amendment to the Sherman antitrust law in their respective Houses, and to lend their aid in every reasonable manner for its passage, as follows: Provided, That this act shall not be construed to apply to any arrangement, agreement, or combination between the laborers made with a view of lessening the number of hours of labor or increasing wages; nor to any arrangement, agreement, or combination among persons engaged in horticulture, agriculture, dairying, live stock, or poultry raising made with a view of minimizing the expense of marketing horticultural, agricultural, or dairy products of live stock or poultry; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing be immediately transmitted by the secretary of state to each of the Senators and Representatives from this State.

C. A. INGRAM,
Speaker of the Assembly.
THOMAS MORRIS,
President of the Senate.
C. E. SHAFFER,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
F. M. WYLIE,
Chief Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. STEPHENSON presented a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, memorializing Congress to take proper steps for the adoption of an amendment to the Federal Constitution providing that such Constitution may hereafter be amended by the initiative, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD. [See p. 1873.]

He also presented a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, memorializing Congress to take proper steps toward a constitutional amendment providing for initiative, referendum, and recall, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD. [See p. 1872.]

He also presented a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, memorializing Congress to grant to Alaska a Territorial form of government, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and ordered to be printed in the RECORD. [See p. 1873.]

He also presented a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, relating to national constitutional convention, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD. [See p. 1873.]

Mr. RAYNER presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Silver Run, Md., remonstrating against the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I present a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, relative to the sending into any State money or campaign literature in violation of the corrupt-practices law of that State. I ask that the joint resolution be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution (J. Res. 123, A.) relating to the sending into any State of money or campaign literature in violation of the corrupt-practice law of that State.

GOVERNMENT OF PORTUGAL.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, yesterday there appeared in the New York Sun an interesting interview by Mr. Theodore Stanton on the conditions in Portugal, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Sun, Sunday, June 11, 1911.]

REAL PEACE IN PORTUGAL—THEODORE STANTON RETURNS FROM A TRIP ABROAD—THINKS THE UNITED STATES SHOULD HAVE RECOGNIZED THE NEW REPUBLIC MONTHS AGO—ALFONSO OF SPAIN IS KEEPING IN THE BACKGROUND, HE THINKS.

Theodore Stanton, son of Elizabeth Cady Stanton, who has had large experience as a European correspondent for American publications, returned yesterday on the steamship Savoie after a three months' visit to European capitals. Mr. Stanton, who is a brother of Harriot Stanton Blatch, spent part of his time in Portugal and Spain and he made some comments on the political situations in those countries.

"I was in Lisbon for more than a week," said Mr. Stanton. "I do not believe that Americans know very much of what has been going on there. While at sea I saw a wireless message to the effect that this country proposed to recognize the provisional Government in Portugal. I was gratified to learn that at last such action is to be taken, although it is very tardy recognition. The only Governments that have recognized the Republic of Portugal are Switzerland and Brazil. I know that the representatives of the provisional Government expected moral support from our country and they were disappointed that they did not get it.

"And they should have had it. The Portuguese Republic should have been recognized by us months ago. We recognized the French Republic promptly—two days after it had been organized. There was less reason for us recognizing the Republic of France than there was for this country stepping in and giving the Portuguese Republic moral support. In France the republican deputies took charge of the organization of the Government on their own initiative, but in Portugal a committee organized by the Republicans who successfully carried on the revolution and banished King Manuel was in charge of the Government. Now, we have done nothing to hold up the hands of this republican Government.

"One thing is certain: I do not believe that the facts of what has been going on in Portugal have been truthfully presented to the rest of the world. I have seen reports of trouble and disorder in the country. Personally, I saw nothing of the kind in all the time I was in Lisbon. Everything was orderly and peaceable, and the Government is in the control of competent and capable men.

"Minister of Foreign Affairs Machado is a cultivated and intelligent gentleman. He is progressive and up to date in his methods. Americans do not understand what influence they have on the democracy of Europe. They are too much interested in their own affairs, domestic and economic. We are solving problems, great problems, which the other countries are only facing.

"Let me illustrate what I mean: Take the subject of woman suffrage. Minister Machado, who has 12 children, many of whom are girls, questioned me about woman suffrage at luncheon with him one day. He wanted to know what we were doing about it. I told him that we had been dealing with the question for years, and that it was now actually being tried in five States here. It was no longer an academic question with us; we were actually solving it.

"He was very much interested, and we had a rather lengthy discussion of the question. Two days later I left Lisbon, and imagine my surprise when I read a dispatch saying that Minister Machado had informed the journalists, whom he sees every Saturday, that the provisional Government would introduce a bill for woman suffrage.

"Minister of Justice Costa, who is referred to as 'the strong man' of this energetic provisional Government, is businesslike and his methods are very American. You know, in Europe if you have arranged for an interview with an official that interview is carried out in the traditional formal manner, no matter how trivial the subject may be. Minister Costa, of course, deals with affairs of importance as they should be dealt with, but I have seen him clean out a whole room, shaking hands here and with a word here and there, as one of our hustling American officials would.

"I had an amusing experience when I left Lisbon. Minister Machado was at the hotel and there was an automobile waiting outside. He told me to have my luggage put on a bus and he would take me to the boat in an automobile. When I stepped into the auto I saw the coat of arms of the Queen Mother. Of course, the provisional Government uses all the paraphernalia left by the royal family, but I am sure King Manuel and his family were treated very decently. I know that the royal jewels, which they left behind in their hurried departure, were sent to them."

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, while I have the floor I want to remind the Committee on Foreign Relations that on the 6th of April, more than two months ago, I introduced a resolution (S. Res. 11) on this subject and had it referred to that committee. So far as I have been advised, nothing has been done with the resolution by the committee. The newspapers tell us that from time to time the President, probably on the suggestion of the State Department, sends congratulatory cablegrams to kings and shahs on their birthdays and expressing the hope that the empires over which they preside will have success and continued prosperity. They also tell us that we will be specially represented at the coronation of King George V of Great Britain.

Yet, Mr. President, there is not a word of sympathy, so far as we are able to see, for the people of Portugal, struggling for self-government and obtaining it by revolution, as was done last October. Not only is there want of sympathy, but there is absolutely want even of a cold and formal recognition of the Republic of that country, which was established more than eight months ago.

I thought it well to present this statement of Mr. Stanton to the Senate and have it specially referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and see if something can be done with the resolution; that it be reported either adversely or favorably.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reference will be made as requested.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I unfortunately was not present at the beginning of the remarks of the Senator from Texas, but coming in from a committee meeting I heard the close of his remarks, and I infer that he was speaking of a reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations of a resolution with regard to the recognition of the Republic of Portugal.

I wish to say that, in view of that resolution, when the nomination of a minister to Portugal came before the Committee on Foreign Relations a few weeks ago, as a member of a subcommittee to consider that nomination I wrote to the Secretary of State asking information as to the status of Portugal in its relations to this country, and I received a reply to the letter, which I laid before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I handed a copy of the letter to the Senator from Texas. That letter I have not at hand at this moment, but I will obtain it and lay it before the Senate.

The substance of the letter was that pending the final settlement of the form and character of the Government of Portugal by the people of Portugal, which is now in process, neither the United States nor any other of the principal countries of the world have gone further than to recognize the de facto government. We do not appear to have been asked to go further than to recognize the de facto government, for the representative of Portugal in this capital has never presented any new credentials or asked for any new recognition. In the absence of any expression of a wish on the part of the people of Portugal or of the provisional republican government of Portugal, of course the Government of the United States has remained quiet and will naturally do so until the present process of determining and establishing the final and permanent government of that country is concluded and that Government asks for a new and specific recognition.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, in the statement which I asked to have printed in the RECORD, Mr. Stanton, who is just from Portugal, states that the people who are behind this movement for the establishment of a republic, and who have in fact established it, in a provisional form, however, have been greatly surprised that the United States has not followed the example of Switzerland and Brazil, for instance, who formally and officially recognized the establishment of a republic in Portugal.

The President, in his message sent to the Senate and the House in December, stated expressly that the only recognition which the executive department had accorded to Portugal was simply for business purposes, and that is the effect of the letter from the Secretary of State, of which the Senator from New York allowed me to have a copy.

My complaint is that the Executive Department of the United States, not following the course it did in the establishment of the Republic of France, is waiting for monarchies of Europe to set the example of acknowledging the existence of republics, and not following, rather, the example of Brazil and Switzerland in this particular case.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I must beg leave to doubt whether Mr. Stanton knows better what the people of Portugal desire than the Government which now exists in that country, or that he is a better representative of the wishes of that Government than the minister who is accredited to the Government of the United States, and who is permitted by the present Government of Portugal to remain as its representative.

I now have the letter to which I referred, which I will send to the desk and ask that it be read to the Senate and placed on the files of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the letter.

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 10, 1911.

Hon. ELIHU ROOT, United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 3d instant in which you request, for the use of the Committee on Foreign Relations in considering the nomination of Mr. Edward V. Morgan as minister at Lisbon, information as to what has been done by this Government and other powers in the matter of the formal recognition of the new Republic of Portugal; whether the representative of that country at this capital has been accredited by the new Government; whether our representative at Lisbon has been received by that Government; and also as to the extent the provisional Government of Portugal has been superseded by a more permanent organization.

In reply I have the honor to inform you that, pending the meeting of the constituent assembly in Portugal and the expression by the people of that country as to the form of government they may desire, this Government has not recognized the Republic of Portugal, but only the de facto Government for the purposes of conducting current business. Our course in this matter has been similar to that adopted by all the nations of Europe. It is expected that the constituent assembly will meet some time this month and the matter be definitely settled.

The representative of Portugal at this capital, who was the minister under the monarchy, continues to transmit communications from the Government of Portugal to the State Department, but has not as yet presented credentials from the de facto Government.

It is thought by the department that the result of the meeting of the constituent assembly will be the establishment of a republic in Portugal which this Government as well as others can recognize, and the present representative of that country will then be in a position to present his credentials as the representative of the Republic of Portugal.

As the question of the form of government to be adopted by the people of Portugal is one that will be definitely settled in the near future, and as Mr. Morgan, should he be confirmed by the Senate, would not be able to go to Portugal before the meeting of the constituent assembly and the adoption by the people of a form of government which this Government could recognize, there would be no possibility of complications.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

P. C. KNOX.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask the Secretary to read the cablegrams from the President and the replies which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

MR. TAFT CONGRATULATES TWO ROYAL SOVEREIGNS—COMPLIMENTARY MESSAGES FLY BETWEEN WASHINGTON, BRUSSELS, AND TEHERAN.

President Taft has been exchanging complimentary messages of congratulation with the King of Belgium and the Shah of Persia, the texts having been given out at the White House to-day. They are as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 8, 1911.

HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF THE BELGIANS, Brussels:

On this anniversary of Your Majesty's birth I offer to you my cordial congratulations and at the same time convey to you the expression of the good will that this Government and people bear to your country and their wishes for its continued prosperity.

(Signed) WILLIAM H. TAFT.

BRUSSELS, April 9, 1911.

HIS EXCELLENCY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, Washington:

The cordial felicitations and wishes your excellency was so good as to address to me, both in your name and in that of the Government of the people of the United States, have deeply moved me, and I beg your excellency to accept my sincere thanks as well as the wishes I make for the prosperity of the great American Nation.

ALBERT.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, March 30, 1911.

HIS IMPERIAL MAJESTY THE SHAH OF PERSIA, Teheran:

In connection with the celebration of the new year I avail myself of this occasion to offer to your majesty my sincerest congratulations and my best wishes for your happiness and the prosperity of the Persian Empire.

WILLIAM H. TAFT.

TEHERAN, April 9, 1911.

Mr. TAFT, President of the United States of America, Washington:

I am deeply gratified by your kind telegram offering congratulations on the occasion of the novrouz, and I warmly reciprocate your good wishes. I avail myself of this opportunity to thank you for the tokens of good will given by your Government to my country, which I trust will still further strengthen the bonds of amity between the two nations.

ABOUL KASSEM, Regent.

TAFT CONGRATULATES KINGS—MESSAGES TO KING GEORGE V, OF GREAT BRITAIN, AND TO THE KING OF DENMARK.

WASHINGTON, June 8.

President Taft to-day sent messages of congratulation to two European monarchs, King George of Great Britain and the King of Denmark. The dispatch to King George was as follows:

HIS MAJESTY KING GEORGE V, Buckingham Palace, London:

I offer on this anniversary of your birth my cordial congratulations, with earnest wishes for your welfare and for the continued peace and prosperity of your country.

W. H. TAFT.

Here is the President's message to the King of Denmark:

HIS MAJESTY THE KING OF DENMARK, Copenhagen:

I beg Your Majesty's acceptance of my congratulations on this anniversary and my best wishes for the welfare and the continued prosperity of the people of Denmark under your reign.

WILLIAM H. TAFT.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, let me add to this interesting collection, which the Senator from Texas has laid before the Senate, a statement that he can find similar dispatches and similar replies on the occasion of the birthday of every ruler in the civilized world from George Washington's time down to the present.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to emphasize the fact that while the President recalls the birthday of kings, there is no cablegram from the President sent to the provisional President of the Republic of Portugal.

Mr. ROOT. Is the Senator from Texas advised whether the provisional President of Portugal has had a birthday recently?

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not care about the birthday, but am concerned about the celebration of the establishment of a Republic in Portugal.

RATIFICATION OF PROPOSED INCOME-TAX AMENDMENT.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I present a notice signed by the secretary of state of the State of Alabama of the ratification of the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States by the legislature of that State.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think on such an unusual occasion that the resolution of the Legislature of Alabama should be read, so that it may go into the RECORD. It relates to a matter of very great importance, and the RECORD should show it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

House joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Alabama, ratifying the sixteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

Whereas the Congress of the United States on July 12, 1909, adopted a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution:

"'ARTICLE XVI. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States, and without regard to any census or enumeration.'"

And the foregoing proposed amendment having been laid before the Legislature of the State of Alabama for consideration and action: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Alabama, That the foregoing amendment to the Constitution of the United States be, and the same is hereby, ratified to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution of the United States.

2. That the governor of this State is hereby requested to forward to the President of the United States an authentic copy of the foregoing joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The paper will be referred to the Secretary of the Senate to be placed on file.

PUBLIC HEALTH AND MARINE-HOSPITAL SERVICE.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine, to which was referred the bill (S. 2117) to promote the efficiency of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 61) thereon.

PURCHASE OF LAND BY MASONIC ORDER OF OKLAHOMA.

Mr. GAMBLE. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2355) extending the time for payment of balance due on purchase price of a certain tract of land, to report it favorably with an amendment striking out the preamble, and I submit a report (No. 62) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] to the bill.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 2355), as follows:

Whereas under the act approved January 31, 1910 (Public, No. 29), the Grand Lodge of Ancient Free and Accepted Masons of the State of Oklahoma purchased a certain tract of land described in said act, and paid on the purchase price thereof a cash payment of $25,000, as required by said act, and also $25,129.65, the amount of the first of the two annual payments required under the terms of said act: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the balance due the United States for the land purchased by the Grand Lodge of Ancient Free and Accepted Masons of the State of Oklahoma, under the provisions of said act approved January 31, 1910 (Public, No. 29), may be paid in five equal annual installments, beginning at the time the second annual payment, under the original purchase, shall become due, with interest at 5 per cent per annum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was rejected.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to prepare from records in his possession, either those of the United States Government or those of the late Confederate States, and to transmit to the President of the Senate as soon as practicable, a list of persons shown to have sold cotton to the Confederate States government, or to have entered into any agreement to sell cotton to said government, such list to indicate whether there is shown to have been a completed sale or only an agreement to sell; to show, when possible, the residence of the person making such sale or agreement to sell, by county or parish and State; the amount of cotton covered by such sale or agreement; the price to be paid, and whether or not the payment of the agreed price is shown by such records.

TEXTILE INDUSTRY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. GALLINGER. I present an interesting article, which I find in the New York Commercial of June 6, on the textile industry of the United States. I ask that the article be referred to the Committee on Printing, with a view to having it printed as a public document if the committee approves.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The article will be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. The Chair lays before the Senate House joint resolution No. 39, under the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore entered into.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the substitute to the joint resolution offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I probably should not have risen to the discussion of this subject unless I felt that I could present to the Senate some observations that have not yet been made upon the subject. So far this matter has been discussed in relation only to two propositions—the first as to the virtue of the present provision in the Constitution and the second as to the evils that have flowed from that provision. I wish to give the Senate a statement of some of the benefits and some of the evils that will flow from the provision as it is proposed to be amended.

We have had, Mr. President, primary election laws in some of our States a sufficient length of time for us to forecast, at least, the conditions that will arise under the new provision. The primary election for the nomination of Senators by popular vote will, in all respects, be practically the same as the election of a Senator by popular vote, and the investigation of the conditions that have entered into and surrounded the election of United States Senators in the several States under primary-election laws will, I think, be instructive in guiding our judgment in considering the proposed change to the Constitution.

Mr. President, I intend to vote for the joint resolution which will provide for the election of United States Senators by popular vote. I desire, however, to discuss not only the good but some of the evils of the new proposition, and I wish to condense what I have to say into as few words and sentences as possible.

Mr. President, this proposed amendment to the Constitution, if adopted, will measure a great advance in the drift of our form of government from the representative established by our fathers to the democratic idea of to-day. It presupposes either a changed condition of our people requiring a modification of that document, or an error which has always been in it. The framers of the Constitution, learned in history and profound in their knowledge of human weakness, were all in accord in seeking to establish that form of government which should give to each individual of the mass complete and as direct a participation in all the affairs of government as should be consistent with national safety and stability.

They aimed to create a government by the people which should at all times assure the liberties of its citizens and protect them in the enjoyments of the fruits of their industry. Before them as they labored were the models of all old republics, and in their hands were the histories which recorded their ruin. They recognized the fundamental truth that the liberty of the governed must ever rest upon the stability of the government; that instability and fluctuating national policies were the foes of prosperity and progress. They were fearful alike of the rigid and selfish autocracy of an absolute monarchy on the one side, and the erratic excesses of an absolute democracy on the other. They adopted, therefore, as the foundation of their structure the republican or representative idea of government, which should embody the strength and durability of the one and avoid the dangers and excesses of the other.

The fundamental idea of course was a government by the people, the source of all governing power and authority, but through the instrumentality of elected representatives, of men who would be chosen because of their superior knowledge of governmental affairs and requirements, and yet whose tenure of office would at all times compel them to recognize public demands and sentiment. They believed that every law enacted should be the result of careful deliberation in a forum where its every phase might be subjected to the test of that critical analysis which it would ordinarily receive in legislative debate, by those whose general information, supplemented by special investigation and study, should fit them for its discussion.

In the practical application of this most liberal idea of government the framers of the Constitution foresaw some danger—the danger that grows out of overhasty public opinion, too often the result of passion or prejudice flowing from misinformation or distorted truth.

To guard aganst this weakness in their structure of government these patriotic men, whose love of country had been intensified by the long death struggle to bring that country into existence, and actuated only by the desire to create a nation which should be safe against internal passions and dissensions, and strong in the counsels of the world, carefully and deliberately planned for one House of Congress whose larger membership and shorter term should cause it to quickly and naturally respond to each varying wave of public sentiment, and another coordinate house of legislation composed of Members whose term of office should be of sufficient length to allow the public to return to sober and thoughtful deliberation after any turbulent or unjustified wave of public sentiment. While the fundamental idea was that the lower branch of Congress should at all times be directly responsive to public sentiment, whether well or ill advised, the equally important idea was that the Senate should be a check against any hasty legislation that might grow out of the direct responsibility of the House. And so not only was the term of office of Senators made much longer than that of the Members of the House, but it was provided that they should be elected by a body of men, comparatively few in number, selected by the people, and acting after due deliberation in the legislative halls of the State.

This reason was accurately and tersely stated by Hamilton when speaking through the Federalist for the election of Senators by State legislatures:

> That through the medium of the State legislatures, which are select bodies of men, and which are to appoint the Members of the National Senate, there is reason to expect that this branch will generally be composed with peculiar care and judgment; that these circumstances promise greater knowledge and more extensive information in the national councils, and that they will be less apt to be tainted by the spirit of faction and more out of the reach of those occasional ill-humors or temporary prejudices and propensities, which in smaller societies frequently contaminate the public councils, beget injustice and oppression of a part of the community, and engender schemes which, though they gratify momentary inclination or desire, terminate in general distress, dissatisfaction, and disgust.

Further than this, Mr. President, for the very object of effecting a continuity of this body and its purposes it was so arranged that the term of one-third of the membership only should expire with each expiring Congress, thus further removing that body from the dangers of fluctuating public opinion and assuring to a greater degree stability of public or national policies.

For 122 years this form of government has withstood all the strains and shocks incident to the life of any young republic, taking an advanced position in the march of human civilization.

Mr. President, this proposed change in the fundamental idea of the Senate of the United States, as conceived by the fathers, is based, not upon any assumed error on the part of the framers of the Constitution, but rather upon the assumption, first, that we have so far progressed in general knowledge and conservative public opinion as to no longer require those safeguards which were erected as barriers against hasty judgment, and that the personnel of the Senate should now be made to respond more readily to the sentiment of the hour by making the position itself subservient to and dependent upon that sentiment; and, second, that the representatives selected by the people can not be trusted to faithfully represent them—two wholly irreconcilable reasons. For if the people are unable to judge correctly the character of their neighbors with whom they have a close acquaintanceship, how can they judge correctly as to the character of those with whom they can have little if any personal knowledge.

In arriving at a conclusion as to whether the constitutional change should be made in the manner of electing United States Senators, we, as members of this body, are scarcely in the position to treat the subject wholly, from what we may by training or investigation, conceive to be the logical side. As representatives of the people of our respective States we experience a natural delicacy in voicing a conviction that may not accord with the judgment of a majority of our constituents. It is always more comfortable to have our opinions harmonize with those of the greater number. And the desire that our acts shall meet with public approval undoubtedly will have weight in deciding our votes. But, independent of this, we can not divest ourselves of the knowledge and conviction that this a government by the people; that all lawful authority comes from the governed and not from the Government; and that when any question reaches a stage wherein, after as much deliberation as it is liable to receive from the public, the people by a strong preponderance of opinion desire the change, it then becomes the duty of Congress, the Senate as well as the House, to conform to public demand. It is the right and duty of a representative of the people to inform, and as much as he can, to lead those whom he represents to his views on a question of this character, but, failing to accomplish this, his ultimate duty is to carry their views into effect.

This question, Mr. President, is not one of this hour. It has been agitated, as suggested by the Senator from Idaho, more or less for about 80 years, and I believe it has become a settled public conviction that the change should be made; and it is rather upon that than upon the belief that the good in the measure will outweigh the bad, that I shall, if allowed the opportunity, cast my vote for an amendment providing for the election of United States Senators by popular vote. The public, the source of all governmental power, have considered the subject for years. The public, after such consideration, have demanded the change.

I will admit that the conclusion of the public has been upon a presentation of only one side of the question; that neither the reasons governing the framers of the Constitution in adopting the present method of electing United States Senators, nor the evils which will enter into the new system have been presented as thoroughly as those which suggest the necessity of a change. The exhaustive and scholarly address of the late Senator Hoar has been perused by comparatively few, but I am convinced that the matter will not be presented in the future to the public in such manner that they can or will carefully weigh every element that supports either one or the other theory.

With this view, Mr. President, I might rest from further reasons why my vote should be in favor of the amendment, but the importance of this matter demands that it should be treated more in detail. I believe there is no duty which a representative owes to his constituents greater than that of candor; that he who is so fervent in his desire to secure the enactment of any measure that he either blinds himself or attempts to blind the eyes of his constituents to its weaknesses, contemplates only the good, never the abuses which may develop under it, is not a fair and just representative of the people.

I want to be perfectly fair in the consideration of this matter. I do not want to see the people of my State or the public generally deluded with the idea that this contemplated change will be a panacea for all the evils that have shocked them in the matter of election of United States Senators through the medium of legislative assembles.

Mr. President, one can not fail to note that in the consideration of nearly every important measure involving a policy to be pursued many Senators assume the attitude of the barrister rather than the jurist, carefully presenting only the favorable points of his own case, never alluding to its weaknesses, and persistently ignoring the good in the cause for which others may stand. I purpose to deviate from this usual manner of presentation. We can better weigh the merits of any measure that changes existing conditions by comparing the good in the present law with the good in the contempalted one; or, better still, by weighing the known evils of the present law with the reasonably anticipated evils which will result from the new.

What are some of the present evils that will be eliminated by this change? The most important, in my mind, will be the relief afforded the State legislators themselves. The principal function of these bodies is to enact legislation for their respective States. But so important has the office of United States Senator become in the estimation of the public that one-third of the legislatures of the States every two years make their election the dominant issue, to the detriment of all State legislation. And it is an undeniable fact that the legislators are nominated and elected more with the view of their standing on this question than upon their efficiency as State legislators.

This bad feature of the present system would be eliminated by the direct election of United States Senators by the people themselves. And if it were eliminated legislators would be chosen rather because of their fitness for their general legislative duties than because of their fidelity to any senatorial candidate.

In line with this are also the deadlocks that have occurred with increased regularity in our legislatures on account of senatorial elections—deadlocks absorbing all of the time of individual members and rendering abortive whole legislative sessions.

These conditions, Mr. President, have become so prevalent of late years that the public have turned to the election of Senators by popular vote as the only escape, and in that they are unquestionably right.

Another and more important cause which has led to this demand for a change in the manner of election of United States Senators is the bribery and corruption that have been practiced by partisans of candidates, and which sometimes have been indulged in by the candidates themselves, to secure the support of individual legislators; such bribery and corruption as is claimed to have disgraced the legislature of a great State but a couple of years ago. This, perhaps, more than any other, has been the controlling factor in creating a demand for popular election of Senators. If the legislator has no vote in the selection of the Senator he will not be bribed. So reasons the public.

Every one of these reasons, Mr. President, is a valid argument against the present system of electing Senators and is worthy of the greatest consideration in arriving at a conclusion; and if our investigation rested at this point, if looking only at that whch we may escape, we close our eyes to that which we will encounter, our duty would be plain and imperative.

But, Mr. President, he who consoles himself with the idea that when we have secured this amendment to our Constitution our course will be free from further evils of like nature, will not have long to enjoy the rapture of his repose. He will awake to the fact that in escaping the evils of legislative corruption he has entered into a field of equally insidious danger and broader opportunities for the corruptionist. That which has sometimes been brought into use to convert the individual legislator, under the present system, will be used to convert the public, under the new system, not so much by direct dealing with the public as by controlling the source of public political instruction and thereby molding public sentiment.

Coincident, if not preceding this change of election of United States Senators, will be the nomination of Senators by popular vote. This means in most instances a double campaign, first fought to a finish between the candidates of a particular party, and then between the successful condidates of opposing political parties. These double campaigns are so expensive to candidates that only those who have some means dare to enter the contest. Many a good man without considerable worldly possessions, who would be willing to sumbit his candidacy to a body of 100 to 200 men, many of whom might have personal knowledge of his character and worth, would not and could not enter into a contest, State wide, where but a very small percentage of the people might have any personal acquaintance with him.

Cheerfully concurring in the conclusions as to all of the evils that may be avoided by both the nomination and the election of United States Senators by popular vote, no man can deny that the new system opens up a wonderful field of opportunity for both the millionaire and the demagogue—a field broader than any one known in our political history.

Let us turn for a moment from the ethical to the practical side of the question. Let us look at things as they are rather than as we would wish them to be. Let us remember that the root of the evil is not in the fact that Senators are elected by the legislatures, but in human weakness and human dishonesty, and that so long as these remain a component factor in human character, just so long will corrupt influences be exerted and wrong verdicts be rendered, whether it be by the people or their representatives; whether it be through misinformation or through ignorance; whether it be through lack of interest or under the passion of the moment.

The only remedy lies in a quickened public conscience in inculcating a higher standard of political integrity.

I know, Mr. President, that if one is to accept the prevalent idea, the majority of members of legislatures and Congress leave their sense of integrity behind them the moment they are elected. We know that this is not true in any sense. We know that the average legislature represents as high a moral standard as the average public from which such legislature is chosen. We know that the members of these legislatures have equal integrity, and, as a rule, a greater knowledge of public affairs than the average citizen. The very fact of their selection is evidence of that truth. Leave men to their own judgment and conviction and they will select as their representatives those whom they regard as having a broader knowledge of industrial or political conditions than they themselves have.

The late revelations concerning elections in a great county in the State of Ohio show that the public is not wholly exempt from those weaknesses which we unhappily sometimes find in our legislatures.

This Senate is not without its lessons on that truth. Committees have reported in favor of the expulsion of men from this body because of the expenditure by them of such great sums of money in their election that the presumption of fraud and undue influence followed as a natural conclusion. And we have then seen the same men with this stigma upon their honor go before their people again and probably with the expenditure of a quarter as much money be reelected by great majorities.

Now, Mr. President, wherein does this proposed new system give greater opportunities for the corruptionist? First, in the ability of a candidate possessing means, or, having the support of wealth to secure laborers in his political vineyard, advocates for his cause, both on the platform and in the closer communication with the public; second, in the ability to own or subsidize a goodly portion of the press.

Everyone recognizes the importance of a close precinct organization in every campaign. Few men have the means to secure the number of colaborers necessary to organize a State. And it is the number of men who makes the interests of a particular candidate their business that counts for success in any closely contested campaign.

Nor can we blind ourselves to the fact that with the primary-election system has grown the practice on the part of candidates of establishing and purchasing papers by wholesale and retail, with no loftier motive in view than that of destroying their opponents by political libel and falsehoods. Dailies and weeklies are established for no other purpose than that of meeting political exigencies. Those papers often carry on a libelous campaign for years, and editorial writers are employed more because of their ability in cloaking truth, diffusing error, and creating unfounded prejudice than upon their knowledge of public questions.

Here again the man of means, or if he have no great means, through the cooperation of other interests which seek his election, who would corrupt legislators, has a far wider field for the exercise of his or its pernicious inclinations.

I know it is said that this can be met by a strict corrupt-practice act. Mr. President, it can not be met by any such act. An act of this kind could be avoided in so many ways that one can not stop to enumerate them. No law could prohibit the friend of a candidate upon his own responsibility from expending as much as he saw fit. No law could prevent any candidate or his friends from starting a daily or weekly paper or of purchasing any number of them to boom his candidacy. No law could prevent one man from lending money to another or could compel the debtor to repay when the creditor is not pressing. Your corrupt-practice act will net the honest and conscientious man, but the rogue will work himself through its meshes. But you say this applies to the election of others than United States Senators—to governors and Congressmen. Yes; but usually in a much less degree.

The position of United States Senator seems to overshadow that of governor or Congressman, and hence the journalistic artillery will generally be directed against the candidate for that position. The size of congressional districts generally allows opportunities for a candidate for Congress to meet his constituents and personally refute these errors. The areas of most States make this means of defense practically impossible for most men.

There is also another dangerous portion of the press, and which must be reckoned with. It is that portion which, having a view of its own upon economic questions, seeks to destroy, by unfair publications, any public official who does not conform to its views. This is one of the greatest dangers to our people to-day, demoralizing alike to the corruptly inclined and misleading to those who are ignorant of the real questions involved. A falsehood in print looks exactly like the truth to the man who does not know it is a falsehood, and hence the temptation to use this weapon of political warfare in a campaign before the public, a weapon which is abandoned as practically useless in a campaign before, if not the better informed, at least the more easily informed, members of the legislatures.

The overshadowing importance in the mind of legislators of the senatorial question, the frequency of deadlocks in the election of Senators, and the bribery of individual members of legislatures to secure the election of Senators, are perhaps about all the public have considered in arriving at their conclusion, that by their direct vote they should select the Members of the upper House of Congress. Have they considered any of these other questions which should challenge thought and deliberation before making a change? Are not these grave dangers in the system which we are contemplating, and are they not equally obnoxious? A timely consideration of some of these dangers may assist in avoiding them to some extent when we shall have adopted the new system.

You say that legislators' votes have been purchased and other corrupt influences used to elect United States Senators. This is lamentably true. In cases where the contest is close between two candidates the outright purchase of two or three votes may decide the cause in favor of the corruptor. But will you escape this danger by the election of Senators by popular vote? If a candidate will debauch members of the legislature in order to secure a seat in the Senate of the United States, may he not, and will he not, if it is in his power, debauch a sufficient number of the public in a close contest to gain his point? Does not the average legislature measure in integrity with the average honesty of the public?

I am well aware that the whole teaching of the press to-day would indicate that men, who have borne an unsullied reputation for sincerity and character in the community from which they have been elected, may be assumed to have lost that character the moment that they become members of the State legislature or of any other political body. You know, I know, and every thinking man knows, that this is a libel upon the legislative bodies and the Congress of the United States. Every legislative assembly represents the average integrity of the State and more than the average knowledge of men and measures.

But you say the units making up the public are so numerous that it would be impossible to corrupt a sufficient number to change an election. That would depend entirely upon how close was the contest. It is impossible to corrupt any material percentage of the public. It is equally impossible to corrupt any large or material percentage of the legislature. It is in the closely contested cases where the corruptionist can work to advantage.

But there is another means used by corrupt men to secure official recognition that is equally obnoxious to honest thinking men, and that is the element of deception. I know the corrupter, the candidate without character, has a greater opportunity before the public generally than he would have before any legislative assembly in practicing any character of deception. Why? First, because his opponent can meet and show the deception to one or two hundred men where he would not be able to meet and confute the falsehood before one or two or five million men; second, because of the greater knowledge of the members of the legislature, of both public men and measures, they are less easily imposed upon.

Mr. President, more erroneous and wrongful public verdicts have been rendered—a thousand times more—through the medium of political deception than were ever secured through the purchase of votes.

False verdicts of a legislature may be set aside by this body. But where is the remedy against the widespread deception or error produced through the instrumentality of yellow and unprincipled journalism. I know your answer that truth will prevail in the end. Yes, Mr. President, but many an honest man may go down to political death in his battle to establish that truth.

We have of late years adopted a primary system in many of the States, and it is an undeniable fact that men are nominated, not so much so through the commendation of the press as through the prejudice that is created against their adversaries through the condemnation of a purchased press, men who have never been able and probably never could have been able to secure nomination by any convention.

Under a system of popular election of Senators the candidate who has the means, either himself or at his disposal, has a mighty advantage over his adversary who has none. And, as I have suggested, there are many men of superior intellect and fitness who could and would submit their candidacy to a State legislature who would not dare to enter into a political contest involving, as it does, the enormous expenses incident to a primary campaign, and inviting, as it does, pernicious assault upon his character as a citizen or public servant.

In a close contest the percentage which will decide may be very small, and that which becomes the element of bribery before a legislature becomes equally potent in deciding the fate of candidates before the public.

With commendable zeal the press of the country has condemned bribery or corruption in any form in official life. I think its zeal in that direction has of late years led it into accusations of official dereliction where the most conscientious integrity has governed the official action. And I wish, Mr. President, that the press and the journals of the country could realize to what extent they are themselves responsible for laxity of political morals. As long as any portion of the press by its own precept teaches the pernicious doctrine that all is fair in politics, so long will unfairness and political corruption continue. The press, the instructor of the public, can hardly expect a higher standard of political virtue on the part of the tutored than is manifested by the tutor. Whenever an honest and capable man is deprived of his merited success by corrupt practices acting upon legislators, the public as well as he has been grievously wronged, and the act merits the strongest condemnation. So, too, whenever an honest and capable man is deprived of an election by reason of unfounded prejudice produced by unjust criticism or distorted truth by the press, an injustice to both the man and to the public has been done, which also merits equal condemnation. But the press seems to fail to see the wrong committed by itself, and that by its own conduct, creating in the minds of the people an idea that all is fair in politics, it thereby encourages and condones corrupt practices to gain political success.

Mr. President, no greater or more patriotic reform crusade could be carried on by the conservative and reliable portion of the press of the country to-day than an unremitting war upon the yellow, sensational, and worse than unreliable portion of its own cult.

I wish to call attention to another weakness in this proposed change, and that is its tendency to destroy party affiliations and party organization.

Mr. President, I have seen nothing in the government of any country in the world that is so beneficial in its result as government by party. An absolute monarchy may govern reasonably well if it is so inclined. But wherever the duty and responsibility of government rest upon its people they need some method, some organization, where men, agreeing generally upon great public questions or policies, but with divergent ideas on details, may, by subrogating some of the individual ideas to the general policy, crystallize their principles into appropriate legislation. Two nearly evenly balanced parties, each seeking to install itself in the confidence and esteem of the public, each watching the other for the first sign of weakness or error, will do more for a country and the real cause of progress and prosperity of the people than any other possible agency.

The nomination and election of United States Senators by popular vote will do more than anything else to destroy the dominant party and finally result in party elimination entirely. Those who believe that the breaking up of party lines will result in benefit to the country may take great courage under this proposed amendment and under our present primary system with its double elections.

The tendency is always toward factionalism in the dominant party. It may be said to be equally so in the minority party, but the latter, through stress of necessity, is forced to greater unity of action. The two factions of the dominant party each seeks to nominate its candidate, and so bitter are the factional battles, so intense is the hostility of the partisan following of the one against his adversary, so blackened in that contest by press and speaker is the character of the one who may succeed, that the adherents of the defeated will in the final election turn rather to his political opponent than to the victor of their own party.

There is little comfort in this for the minority party, because the moment it becomes the majority party the same conditions will follow. The result of this is that the Senator elected may not represent the political views of the majority of his constituents.

We have an illustration of this in the election of a Republican governor in the State of Tennessee. The present governor of the State, in my belief, is not the actual choice of the majority of the voters of that State. His election was not the result so much of political friendship for him as of a factional enmity toward his adversary. And so intense was that enmity, and so irresistible its result, that even the name and fame of the honorable Senator from Tennessee, who put the weight of his own personality into the contest, failed to save the prestige of his party.

Under this system Republican States elect Democratic governors and Democratic States Republican governors. Under this system States nearly two to one Republican and believers in Republican policies have representatives in the Senate of the United States who do not believe in Republican policies. The election of United States Senators by popular vote means the substitution of pluralities for party majorities.

Mr. President, the mere changing of the method of election of United States Senators will not materially affect our immediate future. The representation of each State of the Union in the upper House of Congress will remain the same. The longer terms of the Senators and the continuity of the Senate will make this the deliberative Chamber and insure a reasonable check against hasty and ill-considered legislation.

It is not the mere fact of changing the Constitution, as provided in this resolution, that constitutes the real danger, but rather the doctrine upon which it is advocated, that the people need no constitutional restraints upon their momentary impulses.

Mr. President, we are growing restive under any constitutional restraint. We are teaching that legislatures are usurpers of functions that rightly belong only to the people, and so we are demanding initiative and referendum and recall, and so forth. We are teaching that our chosen legislators, men who are selected by their neighbors because of their standing and ability, can not be trusted, and so we are demanding the election of United States Senators by popular vote. We are teaching lack of confidence in law or Constitution or courts or anything but the ill considered and sometimes the ill-advised judgment of the public. We are teaching the fallacious doctrine that majorities can not be wrong. We are undermining in every way the representative and substituting the democratic form of government.

I still believe that a representative form of government is the only safe and enduring form for a free people. I believe that the only way to secure consistent and valuable legislation is through the instrumentality of a legislature and a Congress in an arena where free and immediate argument and counter argument can take place. I believe that the legislatures of the the several States selected by the people because of their confidence in their fitness are better qualified to frame laws than it is possible for the general public to do, and that they will make fewer mistakes or errors. But the demagogue and demagogic press never fail to charge that anyone, who in the arena of public discussion, ventures the suggestion that these matters should be left as they are, is against the people; that he does not trust the people if he favors constitutions and the instrumentalities which the fathers thought necessary for national safety.

To what absurdities do these teachings ultimately lead us? If the legislative functions should be recalled from legislatures and vested again in the people, why not also judicial functions? Why should not judgments be set aside or appeals allowed or disallowed by popular vote? Why should not the power be exercised to recall the judge whenever his opinion upon any question does not meet with the approval of the majority? Why should not lynch law take the place of judicial trial and execution? Why should anything ever stand in the way of the immediate application and enforcement of popular will?

Mr. President, every legislature in the United States is composed of two houses. Why? Because the second house insures greater consideration and operates as a check against hasty and ill-considered legislation. Why are appeals allowed in our courts? They are allowed to check hasty and ill-considered judgments. We acknowledge the necessity of checks against the hasty action of learned statesmen and jurists, and yet we are charged with being against the public if we insist that the people themselves, like the legislatures and the courts, need constitutional checks against hasty action.

Mr. President, humanity will have reached the millennium when it no longer needs restraints against its own passions, its prejudices and emotions. Under our representative form of government whatever the people, after deliberation, decide that they want, they always have got and always will get, and it needs no change of Constitution to secure that end.

Let the cry of fire be heard in any great assemblage of men and women, housed in theater or hall, and that body of people, generally calm and deliberative, may become instantly stampeded. Reason for a moment will forsake her mental throne, and those old impulses, engendered in the prehistoric struggles for existence and borne down to us from their ancient source on the waveless river of heredity, will assume a mad and momentary control of our actions, and brute force will take the place of human reason.

In every possible way we guard against these dangers, and it never occurs to us that in doing so we are evidencing our lack of faith in humanity. We know that a whole army may sometime be stampeded, and the general who does not recognize that truth and take every precaution to check it is not a safe commander.

Mr. President, in the political world the public may for a moment become stampeded, and the form of government which does not have its checks and barriers against these periodical occurrences is not a perfect government.

Our fathers sought to establish this necessary check by providing for one body, the indirect method of whose election should remove it from the immediate and direct influence of the passions or the prejudices of the moment. This amendment, while it does not, in my judgment, wholly destroy, certainly weakens this salutary check.

Suppose both Houses of Congress had been in session during the early summer of 1896, and the Senators, like the Members of the House, had been elected for a term of two years only, and their election in the fall of that year depended upon a vote upon the great silver issue. Does anyone seriously doubt that we should have had free-silver legislation? Does anyone doubt that the first impulse of the public was overwhelmingly in favor of the free-silver doctrine? Will not the vast majority of thinking men now agree that such legislation would have been disastrous?

Mr. President, I have in this brief statement presented both the benefit and the evil that will flow directly from the proposed amendment, as well as what I think is the dangerous tendency of the times.

If I am asked why I vote for this amendment, notwithstanding the dangers which I have pointed out, I answer: First, because I believe that the vast majority of the people of the country, not under the impulse of the moment, but after the matter has been discussed for years, want the change, and under both the letter and spirit of our Constitution the right to finally chose the form of our Constitution, as well as our laws, rests in the people. In presenting its dangers alongside of its benefits I have performed my duty; second, I am not placing the amendment in the Constitution, but I am saying that it shall be submitted to the legislatures of the States, there to be considered, I hope, earnestly and dispassionately. I hope that the whole question may be so thoroughly discussed in those legislatures that it shall be brought home to every citizen of the respective States.

Utterances by individual Senators in opposition to this innovation upon our Constitution are, under present conditions, discredited because of assumed interest. I wish to see the matter patriotically discussed by those legislative bodies. I do not believe the result would be very different, because I fear it is difficult to get an unbiased decision at the present time. All national questions seem to take on a partisan or factional aspect.

Mr. President, I can not but believe that if the great address of the venerable Senator from Massachusetts, Senator Hoar, whose counsels still enlightened the Senate Chamber when I first entered it, could be read by all the people of this great country as carefully as they peruse their magazines and papers there would be any great agitation to remove our old constitutional safeguard against irrational judgment.

But the only public demand has been that the Senators shall be elected by popular vote. The public has neither considered nor demanded that there should be hitched to an amendment for the election of United States Senators by popular vote another amendment to the Constitution depriving the Nation of all control over the time, place, and manner of electing Government officials. The former relates only to the method of performing a public function by the people; the latter reaches and threatens the very sovereignty of the Nation itself. No element and no function of national sovereignty ought ever to be left to the caprice or the mercy of any State. National safety demands supreme authority over the election of officials of government, without which it could not exist. Under ordinary and normal conditions no danger might follow the surrender of this authority to the States. But, Mr. President, the strength of a ship is not tried in the calm, but in the storm. A nation must have the power to cope with and meet extraordinary and abnormal conditions.

I believe that national patriotism of the people of the United States to-day is far stronger than State patriotism or State pride. And I am not aware either that the public has asked or any State legislature has petitioned that the General Government surrender any portion of its sovereign power. If I understand public sentiment aright, it is tending toward increased rather than decreased national power and control in every line of public activity. Not smaller but greater nationality is required by the complex industrial and uncertain social conditions of the present age.

Mr. President, this joint resolution provides:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote.

I shall vote for that provision, for the reasons I have stated.

The Constitution provides:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations except as to the places of choosing Senators.

This resolution proposes to strike out the last clause of this provision under which Congress has authority over such elections, and seeks to deprive the National Government of any control over such elections. I shall not vote for that provision, but will support the substitute, which eliminates it from the resolution. If it shall remain in the resolution, I shall certainly cast my vote against both propositions rather than take away any authority which the National Government now possesses over the election of those who are to constitute either branch of Congress.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota a question before he takes his seat. Should section 4, Article I, be repealed, we could not pass the publicity bill, could we?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator is correct, but it is a question which I would not want to answer offhand.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator would have no difficulty in answering it.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama obtained the floor.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. BACON. I desire to offer an amendment to the substitute offered by the Senator from Kansas, which I ask may be read, that it may be immediately printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the substitute will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the substitute proposed by Mr. BRISTOW by adding, on page 2, after line 2, the following:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may make or alter such regulations in any State whenever the legislature thereof shall neglect or refuse to make such regulations, or from any circumstances be incapable of making the same.

Mr. BACON. I ask that the amendment may be immediately printed for the use of the Senate, in order that we may have it in print before the discussion closes.

I will simply state that the language is copied almost literally from the resolution passed by the State of New York when it adopted the Constitution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the course suggested by the Senator from Georgia will be pursued.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. Mr. President, I wish to state briefly my reasons for voting against the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] and why, if that amendment is adopted, I shall vote against the resolution.

I have myself witnessed elections in my State where armed United States troops were assembled at the polls and where United States supervisors and deputy marshals were potential in the result. I never want to see either again. During the reconstruction period these officials were used for the most partisan purposes—to intimidate the voters and prevent the full and free and fair expression of the will of the voters.

Such methods as that gave the party in power swarms of unscrupulous partisans, paid by the Government, to carry out the will of the bosses; and they did not hesitate to abuse their power. These men were not chosen from the voters of the counties in which they acted, but were imported from other cities and counties and States. Pretending to represent the authority of the United States, they really represented the orders of the political bosses of the party in power.

If we are to have Senators elected by the people, they should be the free and untrammeled choice of the people. The members of the legislature, now the electors of Senators, are elected by the free choice of the voters, without any interference or assistance from any Federal officials.

I am unable to see why the people can not be trusted to elect Senators directly, if they can be trusted to elect representatives who can elect Senators.

If the people are to be controlled by outsiders, or tamely submit to it, they are unworthy to elect Senators. If we are now to surrender our right to choose Senators, free from Federal control, in order to obtain a direct vote by the people, I shall prefer no change to be made. If we are to surrender rights we now enjoy to gain this, the price is too great. We will not, like the dog in the fable, give up the substance we have in order to gain an elusive shadow.

So far as I know, every State in the South now nominates Senators by primary elections, and in none has the choice of the people been questioned or denied by the legislature.

Every State can do this without any amendment to the Constitution, without surrendering a single right it has. If the present method of electing Senators is satisfactory to the people of any State, why should other States compel them to change it? We wish to continue to decide for ourselves who shall be the electors. The Constitution and amendments sufficiently guard against unjust discrimination.

It is my intention to vote for the resolution as it passed the House, but if it is changed as proposed by the Senator from Kansas I shall vote against it; and I want to warn the real friends of the measure that to so amend it endangers its passage here and in the House, and if it should survive the action of Congress it will encounter the most strenuous opposition to its ratification by the States.

Senators who really want the resolution adopted, and the right given the people to elect Senators directly, will take a strange course by changing it so as to encounter the most serious opposition in Congress and elsewhere, thus defeating or postponing this reform many years. They may be able to explain to their people their course, but it will require the multiplication of many words.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I dislike to trespass further upon the time of the Senate in the discussion of this question. I will be as brief as the subject will permit.

Some objection has been made to the word "as" as it appears in the joint resolution:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

I shall ask, when we reach the point where I may do so, to eliminate the word "as" from the joint resolution. The objection made is that the language ought to be mandatory, and I have no objection. I do not think the friends of the joint resolution have any objection to the language being changed to that effect.

In my judgment, however, the practical effect would be precisely the same. I can not conceive of an action to compel a State to perform a political function, and it would in practical effect at last rest with the State as to what it should do in prescribing the manner of holding an election. But, notwithstanding that, those who make the objection seem to think its merit is greater than I, and I am perfectly willing at the proper time to ask that the word be eliminated from the joint resolution.

It has also been suggested that Article I, section 4, should have been rewritten; that, as the joint resolution is now presented, it leaves in a certain place in the Constitution a portion of Article I, section 4, and deals with the same subject matter in another portion of the Constitution, and that it would have been better form and better style had we entirely rewritten Article I, section 4.

In answer to that I have this to suggest: We have followed the same method that was adopted in amending the Constitution both as to the fourteenth and as to the twelfth amendment. When we came to amend Article I, section 2, of the Constitution we dealt with the subject matter which was treated by Article I, section 2, in the fourteenth amendment, but did not rewrite Article I, section 2. We did not even refer to the change. We simply took up the subject matter which was covered by Article I, section 2, and covered it by the fourteenth amendment, leaving the old provisions of the Constitution to stand as they now stand in the Constitution with whatever modifications are made by the fourteenth amendment.

This is equally true with reference to Article II, section 1, of the Constitution, which we amended by the twelfth amendment. We did not refer to Article II, section 1, but we simply dealt with the same subject matter and covered the same by the twelfth amendment.

Therefore, whatever value there may be in the objection, the manner in which we are proceeding has precedent in these two instances. I need only say in passing, as everyone will readily recognize, that in construing the Constitution every part of the Constitution is considered, and as was said the other day by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], the original provisions of the Constitution, together with the amendment, would be taken and considered together. I cite briefly some authorities upon that point:

The whole instrument is to be examined with a view to ascertaining the meaning of each and every part. * * * Each provision must be construed so that it shall harmonize with all others without distorting the meaning of any of such provisions to the end that the intent of the framers may be ascertained and carried out and effect given to the instrument as a whole. (Ency. of Law and Procedure, vol. 8, p. 730.)

For the purpose of harmonizing apparently conflicting clauses each must be read with direct reference to every other which relates to the same subject, and so read if possible as to avoid repugnancy. (French v. Teschemaker, 24 Cal., 518.)

Constitutions are not to be interpreted according to the words used in particular clauses. The whole must be considered with a view to ascertaining the sense in which the words were employed and its terms must be taken in their ordinary and common acceptation, because they are presumed to be so understood by the framers and by the people who adopted it. (Wilcox v. People, 90 Ill., 186.)

Mr. BORAH. Article I, section 4, provides:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators.

That is the provision of the Constitution as it now exists. That is the provision which we propose to change by the joint resolution which we are now considering. The joint resolution as reported substitutes for that which I have just read:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

The simple issue, therefore, is that the joint resolution as reported from the committee takes away the proviso which retains in Congress the power to alter or regulate the action of the State.

Both the joint resolution reported from the committee and the substitute repose, in the first instance, in the State the power to fix the times, places, and manner of holding elections.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. BORAH. I will, in just a moment.

The original joint resolution takes away the power to override or overrule the action of the State in case Congress should see fit to do so.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it does more. It leaves the State to fix the place of the election of Senators. Under the Constitution it can only be done where the legislature meets by authority of law. Under this proposed amendment it will be done in each voting precinct in the State, and not at all at the place contemplated in the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. I may be in error as to the suggestion of my colleague, but, as I catch it, it does not change the proposition which I have just suggested, and that is that the original joint resolution as reported from the committee takes away from Congress the power to revise or to overrule the action of the State with reference to the times, places, and manner, except as to the place. The place of choosing Senators is left to the State, according to the now existing provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. HEYBURN. My remark was directed at the remark of my colleague preceding the one to which he refers—I did not know whether I would ask to interrupt him or not at that time—in which the Senator excepted the place.

Mr. BORAH. Very well. I am very glad to have the suggestion, although, I think, when we come to read the RECORD there will be very little difference between my colleague and myself; at least as I understood him.

The exact issue, therefore, which is presented by the original joint resolution and by the substitute of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], is whether or not Congress shall retain the power to revise the action of the State with reference to the times and manner of holding the election.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I hope it will not annoy my colleague, but there are some questions which in this closing hour we ought to understand. Does not the Senator agree that the amendment abolishing the provisions proposed to be abolished in section 4 of Article I would render the passage of the publicity bill futile?

Mr. BORAH. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. HEYBURN. Under what authority can a publicity bill be enacted except under that section?

Mr. BORAH. I will try to cover that before I get through, but I do not desire in this closing hour to be diverted too far or too long from the subject in hand.

The principal contention here is over the words "manner of holding elections." The subject of the change deals alone with the question of the manner of holding the election and not the power to determine who shall be the voter. It deals alone with the question of how the voter shall exercise and put into effect his will.

Mr. HEYBURN. What else is there?

Mr. BORAH. Deals alone with the machinery of holding the election. I read here in connection with this a statement by Justice Field of the Supreme Court, wherein he says:

Regulations as to the manner of holding them [the elections] can not extend beyond the designation of the mode in which the will of the voters shall be expressed and ascertained. The power does not authorize Congress to determine who shall participate in the election or what shall be the qualification of voters. These are matters not pertaining to or involved in the manner of holding the election, and their regulation rests exclusively with the States. The only restriction upon them with respect to these matters is found in the provision that the electors of Representatives in Congress shall have the qualifications required for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature, and the provision relating to the suffrage of the colored race.

A vast amount of confusion has crept into this debate by reason of the fact that the manner of holding elections has been confused with the right to cast a vote after the manner of casting it has been determined. This is discussed later, and I only refer to it in passing.

Mr. President, we do not by this amendment introduce any new or untried principle into the Constitution. We do not invoke an untried proposition. We are not proceeding without experience, and we are not seeking to establish in the Constitution a method which has not heretofore been tried. We leave the manner in which the election of Senators shall be held to be prescribed and determined in the same way that we to-day prescribe and determine the manner of holding the election for presidential electors.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like further to ask my colleague a question here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to his colleague?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. Would this amendment prevent the people of the State from still exercising the right to choose a Senator through the medium of their legislature?

Mr. BORAH. Does my colleague mean the amendment proposed by the committee?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. Inasmuch as the voters of the State are given the power, without limitation or definition, could they not still exercise the right through the legislature, if they saw fit, acting as a people?

Mr. BORAH. I do not understand exactly the point which my colleague is making.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not want to take up the Senator's time.

Mr. BORAH. I should be glad to have the Senator take up enough time to explain what he means.

Mr. HEYBURN. I thought I would succeed in attracting the Senator's attention to that point which he had not covered.

Mr. BORAH. My colleague always attracts my attention.

Mr. HEYBURN. This joint resolution says that—

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof, for six years.

It does not say how the people shall elect them. The people elect them now. Shall the people act through the medium of their legislature? Is that language sufficient, in other words, to prevent them from doing it, should they determine to do it, by the constitution of the State or otherwise?

Mr. BORAH. The friends of the resolution are willing to risk it. I have no doubt, in view of the fact that the change takes it away from the legislature and puts it in the people, a court would construe that the language was sufficient to rest it in the people. The change is perfect both in language and intent.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is no language in the amendment which says the legislature may not do it.

Mr. BORAH. Neither is there in reference to Representatives, and no one except my colleague would ever suggest that the legislature could elect them.

Mr. HEYBURN. The people may do it through the legislature.

Mr. BORAH. I want to call attention, Mr. President, without reading more than a paragraph or so, to some of the language found in the case of McPherson v. Blacker, in 146 United States. Here the question of the power of the legislature over the manner of electing presidential electors came squarely before the court, and the court said:

Under the second clause of Article II of the Constitution, the legislatures of the several States have exclusive power to direct the manner in which the electors of President and Vice President shall be appointed.

Such appointment may be made by the legislatures directly, or by popular vote in districts, or by general ticket, as may be provided by the legislature.

If the terms of the clause left the question of power in doubt, contemporaneous and continuous subsequent practical construction has determined the question as above stated.

The second clause of Article II of the Constitution was not amended by the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments—

It will be recalled that during the last session my colleague suggested that the clause which I am now discussing had been modified by the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments—

The second clause of Article II of the Constitution was not amended by the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, and they do not limit the power of appointment to the particular manner pursued at the time of the adoption of these amendments, or secure to every male inhabitant of a State, being a citizen of the United States, the right from the time of his majority to vote for presidential electors.

On page 35 of the opinion the court said:

From this review, in which we have been assisted by the laborious research of counsel, and which might have been greatly expanded, it is seen that from the formation of the Government until now the practical construction of the clause has conceded plenary power to the State legislatures in the matter of the appointment of electors.

Even in the heated controversy of 1876–77 the electoral vote of Colorado cast by electors chosen by the legislature passed unchallenged, and our attention has not been drawn to any previous attempt to submit to the courts the determination of the constitutionality of State action.

In short, the appointment and mode of appointment of electors belong exclusively to the States, under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. Willoughby, in his work on the Constitution, says:

The Constitution gives complete power to the States in the selection of presidential electors. The provision is that each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct. There is no requirement as to their election by the people. And so plenary is the power thus given to the States in this respect they may, if they see fit, as Representative Storrs once said, vest the appointment of electors in "a board of bank directors, a turnpike corporation, or a synagogue." (Willoughby on the Constitution, vol. 2, p. 1126.)

Not only, Mr. President, is the manner of electing the electors left exclusively to the State legislatures, but Congress has proceeded to accentuate the power of the State and has practically left the determination of the validity of the electoral votes to the State.

In 1887 Congress passed this statute:

If any State shall have provided, by laws enacted prior to the day fixed for the appointment of the electors, for the final determination of any controversy or contest concerning the appointment of all or any of the electors of such State, by judicial or other methods or procedures, and such determinations shall have been made at least six days before the time fixed for the meeting of the electors, such determination made pursuant to such law so existing on said day, and made at least six days prior to the time of meeting of the electors, shall be conclusive, and shall govern in the counting of the electoral votes as provided in the Constitution, and as hereafter regulated, so far as the ascertainment of the electors appointed by such State is concerned. (Act of Feb. 3, 1887, sec. 2.)

Mr. President, the manner of choosing those who select the Executive is left exclusively and alone where we propose to place the power to prescribe the manner with reference to the election of Senators. If a State should refuse to proceed, as has been suggested here, in delinquency of its duty in selecting electors for the Presidency, it would be in precisely the same attitude, it would involve the same dereliction of duty upon the part of the individuals of the State as if they should fail to proceed to elect Senators or to prescribe the manner thereof.

We go back and rest the obligation and the duty where the fathers of the Constitution rested it with reference to the selection of the Executive. It does not seem to me, in view of the fact that here has rested the power to determine how the electors shall be elected for over a hundred years, that it can be said we are trying an experiment, that we are dealing with chance, or that we are jeopardizing the power to preserve the National Government.

There may be room for legitimate discussion between Senators as to where it should best rest, with the legislatures of the States or with the National Government; but when it is urged, as it was a few moments ago by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], that we are striking at the very life of the National Government, it is urged by reason of the fact that Senators have not taken the time to give consideration to what we are doing. We have a class of men who the very moment a power is undertaken to be added to the State's authority are in arms in opposition to the movement, but when some vast power is undertaken to be given to the National Government, as in the fourteenth amendment, they are quite willing to enter upon the sea of experiment and to try a new and untried proposition.

When the Constitution was formed popular elections in the sense in which we have and understand them now were not familiar to the people. Manhood suffrage was most limited. The members of the Confederate Congress were selected by the State legislatures. Most of the State officers were elected by the State legislatures, including governors. But now the respective States have worked out with great care and through long experience their system of popular elections. They elect all of their State officers, and according to a system which time and experience have proven to be efficient and wise. These systems of popular elections are different in different States in matters of detail. And thus popular elections have come peculiarly to be matters of local arrangement. The manner of holding them has become essentially local. The trend of events and the logic of conditions have made them local. Each State has its primary or is coming to have. It fixes its style of ballot, its entire method, mode, and manner of holding popular elections. All these things are essentially local and should be and can be with entire safety left to the States.

What will be the situation when the resolution passes—should it be modified, as suggested and urged? We will have intrusted to the State the sole power to determine, outside of the rule against discrimination, who shall vote for a Senator. We will have intrusted to the State to determine what kind of a man shall be sent here, save as to his age and citizenship. We will have intrusted to the people the power to directly choose Senators, and, sir, we will have intrusted to the voluntary action of the people of the State the sole power to determine whether they will elect a Senator at all or not. For these vague and nebulous suggestions that the National Government could enforce an election are impracticable, unreasonable, and repudiated by experience, by logic, and by the very terms of the Constitution when all its terms are taken together. Yet, after intrusting to the States and the people of the States all these substantial powers, we say they may nevertheless prove unfit to determine the manner of doing this; that they may not be wise enough to say whether they want nominations by primary or open conventions; whether they want the Australian ballot or the open ballot; whether they want protected booths or unprotected booths. The thing of substance they may do, but the manner of doing must be prescribed by another power. I say this is unreasonable, inconsistent, and illogical. It grows out, Mr. President, of an unwarranted distrust of the intelligence and patriotism of the people—an unwarranted distrust of the capacity and integrity of the States to perform their proper functions and discharge the obligations which rest upon them.

Mr. President, I am a believer in nationalism, but I want it to rest upon a broad and sure foundation. I want the pyramid of the Republic to rest upon its base and not upon its apex. I want a nationalism which is founded upon a full and uncompromising faith in the loyalty and self-governing capacity of the people—that is the broad base upon which to build. I want a nationalism which next recognizes the unhampered and unchallenged sovereignty of the States. There can be no such thing as a great Federal Union with stripped and discredited and crippled States. Nationalism such as our institutions will sustain derives its strength and durability from the increasing strength and durability of the States, with their sovereign powers ever undiminished and always unchallenged.

Those who think they can build up a national power at the expense of the sovereignty rightfully belonging to the States, who would aggrandize and accentuate the Federal Government at the expense of the just powers of the State, have either forgotten or never knew the lesson of 1787. The fathers divided the State and national powers upon the logical rule of things which were national in scope and things which were local. They regarded the latter as essential to the life of the State and the former to the life of the National Government, and the preservation of both as indispensable to the growth and prosperity of the people. They realized fully that conditions might necessitate a readjustment or a redistribution of powers, that things then local in their nature might become in time national in their reach and scope, that things which were national might in time become local and better cared for by the State. But the readjustment was always to be made because of the change in the extent and scope of the thing to be dealt with, and not because of a diminishing faith in the capacity of the State to do its duty, or an enlarged faith in the National Government to do more than its duty. It never occurred to them that the individual citizen was the source of one kind of civic righteousness and civic capacity when acting for the State, and a source of higher grade of civic righteousness and civic capacity when acting for the Government. It never occurred to them that the sheriff of the State was of a lower type of official than a United States marshal; that a Federal judge was wiser than a State judge; that a kind of a halo exuded from the Federal citizen that was not always perceptible to the naked eye when beholding a common citizen of the State. This modern distrust of the citizen of the State, this exaltation of and confidence in the Federal Government, was not the theory upon which our dual Government was built. Faith in all its parts, faith in the source of all power, the people, was the theory upon which it was built.

The advices of those who urged a strong Government did not in all their fullness prevail. The jealous guardians of States rights were not permitted to have their way as fully as they thought they ought. The sublimest fact in all our history is that Hamilton and Jefferson lived in those days; that out of concession and compromise, of clashing judgments and conflicting views, came the finished fabric, the dual government, which has excited the wonder and challenged the admiration of all the civilized people of the earth.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to his colleague?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to say in this connection that, being the last hours of the consideration of this measure, I assume the Senator is not expecting to deliver an uninterrupted speech on this occasion.

Mr. BORAH. No; I am not.

Mr. HEYBURN. So I take the liberty of placing in the RECORD some suggestions in connection with his remarks. He is just now engaged in placing the stability and existence of the Government upon the patriotism and loyalty of the people. This is a Government of law, not of sentiment. I should like to know if the Senator has given all the thought that he thinks is necessary to the question as to whether or not the Government can compel a State to exercise the function of a State. Can it do it?

Mr. BORAH. I have given all the thought that I have been able to give, without the benefit of consultation with my colleague. I do not think the National Government could compel a State to elect a Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator thinks it could not?

Mr. BORAH. That is my view.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is to admit that this Government may dissolve itself at the pleasure of any State.

Mr. BORAH. Colorado has not elected a Senator, and we are not dissolved, neither are we in a position to compel Colorado to elect a Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. Colorado has one Senator in this body.

Mr. BORAH. It is entitled under the Constitution to two Senators. If we could compel it to elect at all, we could compel to elect both or either. I am sure that my colleague could find ample compensation from the candidates in Colorado if he could suggest to them a legal method by which to force an election in Colorado.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the State of Colorado or any State should decline to choose representatives in this body the Government has the power to institute conditions in that State that they would be compelled to do it.

Mr. BORAH. I am quite content to leave the solution of this question with my colleague.

But, Mr. President, those who are favoring this proposition are doing so not because they desire to hamper or to embarrass or to disturb the powers which should really belong to the Federal Government..

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. No more important question has been discussed than that which the Senator is now presenting. As I understand him, he is contending that the Government of the United States can not compel a State to elect Senators and send them to this body, when the Constitution, as it now reads, says in express terms that it can do it. It can fix the time; it can say to the State on the 20th day of October it shall elect. It can fix the place; it can say at the capital of the State in the legislative halls. It can fix the manner by saying to the legislature you shall do it by a majority vote. This can be done in the absence of action by the State in conformity with those provisions. There is no question about it; and if the man was elected under those circumstances he would be constitutionally elected.

Now, of what avail is it to say that a State can dissolve itself out of the Union by inaction? It was because of the possibility of such conditions that section 4 of Article I was placed in the Constitution; and it is a dangerous doctrine to send out to the people of this country in times of discontent that they may destroy the Union by inaction. You can not do it either by inaction or by the sword.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I would be very glad to yield to my colleague for any question that he desires to ask, but I do not desire to submit to a lecturing program such as has been going on from time to time in this debate.

Mr. HEYBURN. I hope the Senator will indulge me long enough to speak a valedictory word to him. I had supposed that in these last hours of the debate no man would monopolize the entire time, and I had supposed that any man who took the floor would be open to a free and fair and full discussion of it.

Mr. BORAH. I have never hesitated to yield to my colleague for a question or for an argument, but I do not desire to have my colleague deliver a kindergarten lecture here upon the Constitution to all who assume to express an opinion about it. I have made a statement. If it is one of error, it can go out to the country for what it is worth. But it is not worth while to take up time, after my colleague has once disputed the proposition, to censure its author.

I will say in passing, however, that I have adopted the line of argument, as to this particular, of Mr. Barber and the concessions of Mr. Webster in a very famous case in the Supreme Court of the United States.

It has been urged that Article I, section 4, is necessary to protect elections from fraud and violence, and that without Article I, section 4, the National Government would be without power to protect elections where Federal officers were elected from fraud, violence, or misconduct upon the part of those who should desire to prevent a fair and impartial election. In the minority view which has been filed I find this statement:

> How vital is the preservation of the supervisory power conferred upon Congress by section 4 of Article I was strongly set forth by the Supreme Court of the United States, through Mr. Justice Miller, delivering the opinion in the Yarbrough case (110 U. S., 651). In that case the Supreme Court was passing upon the validity of the Federal election law of 1870, an act based upon the authority conferred by the first clause of section 4 of Article I. We quote from the opinion as follows:

The Senate will notice that in this minority view the statement is made that the Supreme Court was passing upon a statute which was passed under and by virtue of Article I, section 4, and that Justice Miller was of the opinion that that power was vital to preserve and to protect elections against fraud and violence.

I feel compelled, Mr. President, to take a little time to call the attention of the Senate to just exactly what the Supreme Court was passing upon in that particular instance. I assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that the statute which the Supreme Court was passing upon in that instance was not passed under and by virtue of Article I, section 4; that it did not find its constitutionality in the power granted to control the manner of holding elections; and that the section which the Supreme Court was passing on was passed under the implied power which Congress has to protect any right that is guaranteed by or dependent upon the Constitution of the United States. Every line of Justice Miller's opinion as to the validity of the section of the statute here passed upon would have been just the same if Article I, section 4, had not been in the Constitution at all.

I need only read this statute to the Senate in order that the Senate may see upon a moment's reflection that my contention is correct. Section 5508 reads as follows:

> If two or more persons conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having so exercised the same, or if two or more persons go in disguise on the highway, or on the premises of another, with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege so secured, they shall be fined not more than $5,000 and imprisoned not more than 10 years; and shall, moreover, be thereafter ineligible to any office or place of honor, profit, or trust created by the Constitution or laws of the United States.

The statute says "any right guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States." Now, Article I, section 4, deals alone with elections. It is clear that if you were passing this statute under that, and that alone, we would have to have a statute dealing alone with elections. You could not deal with trespasses upon the public lands; you could not deal with the question of interfering with a jury which was impaneled in a Federal court; you could not deal with the question of protecting a prisoner who was in the hands of a United States marshal. Yet there are a number of cases in the Supreme Court of the United States in which the Supreme Court has sustained an indictment under section 5508, covering almost every imaginable right which might arise under the Constitution of the United States.

For instance, under this section a man was prosecuted for interfering with another in trying to prove up a homestead. Do the Senators who signed the minority view think that under Article I, section 4, dealing with elections, you can pass a statute punishing a man for interfering with another in proving up a homestead? Mr. Justice Miller says that this power arises not out of any express provision in the Constitution but out of the implied power that Congress has to protect any right; and a right to vote for Representative, a right to vote for Senator, under this Constitution, if it should be amended, after the State had fixed the status of the voter, would be a right dependent upon the Constitution of the United States.

There was another provision of the same law which was passed upon, and that was section 5520. Notice the reading of this section:

SEC. 5520. If two or more persons in any State or Territory conspire to prevent, by force, intimidation, or threat, any citizen who is lawfully entitled to vote, from giving his support or advocacy, in a legal manner, toward or in favor of the election of any lawfully qualified person as an elector for President or Vice President, or as a Member of the Congress of the United States—

Now, the manner of holding the election of electors for President and Vice President is in the hands of the State legislature. The manner of electing a Representative is in the hands of Congress. Yet we are told that this authority upholds a statute which passed under Article I, section 4, would leave the matter with Congress, while at the same time it protects electors and presidential electors and matters left entirely with the State legislature.

It is apparent, Mr. President, that the court would not have sustained section 5520 if they had gone to Article I, section 4, for the authority of passing it, because it deals with presidential elections, which is provided for in another section of the Constitution and leaves it to the States.

Therefore the court proceeds to find the power to pass this statute under another provision of the Constitution, not written, but as plainly a part of it, since the decision of Chief Justice Marshall, as if it had been written. After quoting a large portion of this opinion the minority view, however, left out of their views this paragraph, and had they observed its applicability it would have answered the argument which they were making. It says:

The proposition that it has no such power is supported by the old argument often heard, often repeated, and in this court never assented to, that when a question of the power of Congress arises the advocate of the power must be able to place his finger on the words which expressly grant it. The brief of counsel before us, though directed to the authority of that body to pass criminal laws, uses the same language. Because there is no express power to provide for preventing violence exercised on the voter as a means of controlling his vote, no such law can be enacted.

Says the counsel:

It destroys at one blow, in construing the Constitution of the United States, the doctrine universally applied to all instruments of writing, that what is implied is as much a part of the instrument as what is expressed. This principle, in its application to the Constitution of the United States, more than to almost any other writing, is a necessity, by reason of the inherent inability to put into words all derivative powers—

The opinion in the Yarbrough case would have been just the same with this provision of the Constitution adopted as we propose, because we leave the manner of holding the election with the State legislature. The Constitution leaves the manner of holding the election of electors to the State legislature; and yet the Supreme Court sustains the statute which protects both elections from fraud and violence. It is quite true that in the latter part of the opinion they refer to section 4 of Article I, but solely in way of illustration, basing their argument upon the general proposition as I have here stated it.

Does the repeal of section 4 of Article I render inoperative the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments? Again, the minority view says:

Fifth. Possession of the power which it is proposed to strike out from section 4 is essential to enable the National Government to act effectively in case it should ever have occasion to enforce the provisions of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution. The basis of any enforcement of those provisions must necessarily be the ascertainment and establishment of the facts in respect of the elections to which they may relate. The proposed amendment of section 4 of Article I, if adopted, would be the latest expression of the sovereign will of the people of the United States, and would take away from the National Government authority to make those regulations regarding elections which are essential to the preservation of evidence regarding what actually occurs.

Is there any doubt, Mr. President, but what the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments could be enforced to-day with reference to presidential electors where the manner of holding the election is left to the State legislature? Is there any possible question but what, under any action that we should take, presidential electors would be included just the same as Members of Congress? It is a confusion, as I said a moment ago, of the manner of holding the elections with the right to cast a ballot in the manner prescribed by the State legislature. In other words, as an illustration, suppose that the State of Missouri should provide the Australian ballot system for recording the ballot. If this joint resolution should pass, I contend that the National Government could not go into the State, as it were, and establish an open ballot, but there is no possible doubt in my mind but what the National Government could see that every man who was qualified to vote for Senator in that State could cast his vote in accordance with the system established in the State. You can not interfere with the form of the ballot; but if the man was deprived of his right to vote, the National Government, if he was voting for Senator or Representative or for a presidential elector, could take such steps as would be necessary to see that he cast his vote in accordance with the system established in that State.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho says that in the absence of section 4 Congress would still have the power to pass legislation, as I understand, that would enable every person who was qualified to vote to cast his vote. If section 4 were eliminated, would it be within the power of Congress to pass legislation which would prevent unauthorized persons from casting their votes?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Under what clause of the Constitution?

Mr. BORAH. Because the Congress would have power to protect any election against fraud or anything of that kind where a Federal officer was being elected. I am coming to that in just a moment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will permit me just a word further, the Constitution, I agree with the Senator, in effect guarantees the right of persons who are authorized to vote to cast their votes; but if there is any provision in the Constitution which guarantees that unauthorized persons shall not cast their votes, I have failed to find it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, one of the cases to which I will refer was a ballot-box-stuffing case, and the Supreme Court sustained a statute which protected presidential electors the same as the election of Representatives. While I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate in reading that opinion, if Senators will refer to the case to which I have just been referring, the Yarbrough case, they will find that the court made no distinction in protecting elections against fraud or imposition or violence or misrepresentation between presidential electors and Members of the House of Representatives; but the decision turns upon the right of the National Government to see that its elections, where parties being elected to Federal offices are candidates, are protected from violence, fraud, or anything which interferes with an honest and a free vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator permit one further question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator from Idaho thinks that the change which is proposed to be made in section 4, Article I, of the Constitution, will still leave the power of Congress unimpaired, then what good purpose does the Senator see in making the change at all?

Mr. BORAH. I will give the Senator from Utah an illustration which shows precisely what I am trying to do: Suppose the State of Utah prescribed a certain form of ballot—we will say the Australian ballot—I maintain that the National Government should have no power to go in there and establish an open ballot. That is precisely the power which I insist on taking away, and that is the substance of the power which we do take away; but we do not take away from the National Government the power to see that the voter casts his vote according to the Australian ballot system, because the one is a right to cast the vote, while the other relates alone to the manner in which he records it.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. WORKS. If the National Government has the right to protect the legal voter in the right to cast his vote and to have that vote counted, has it not, for the very same reason and upon the same principle, the right to protect that vote by preventing a fraudulent vote that would nullify it?

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt about it at all. If the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] will reflect for a moment upon the difference between the manner of recording a vote and the right to cast it, he will get the idea of the Senator from Idaho with reference to the distinction which he is trying to make. While I am going to discuss that in a few moments, I take this opportunity to say again: Suppose the State of Utah should establish a certain form of booth where the election should be held, where the State elections are being held, where the governor is being elected, and where the popular election is coming off. The State knows best the manner in which to hold its elections, so far as the manner is concerned, and the National Government could not come in and change the machinery, change the modus operandi, whether it be the Australian ballot or whatever it may be; but whenever a State undertakes to deprive, or an individual undertakes to deprive, a party of the right of casting his vote according to the system prescribed by the State, there is no doubt but what the National Government can prevent it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Now, Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator thinks that if a State should adopt the Australian ballot, the General Government ought not to step in and provide for an open vote. I agree with him about that. The General Government ought not to do that. But suppose the converse of that were true; suppose the State should adopt the open ballot and provide that votes should be cast as under the English system at the hustings by a viva voce proceeding, would the Senator think that it would be wise on the part of the General Government to step in, as it has stepped in, and provide a written or printed ballot?

Mr. BORAH. No, sir; I would not.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then does the Senator——

Mr. BORAH. The vital distinction between the Senator from Utah and myself is that I do not expect to find any greater wisdom up here than we shall find down there in the States.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But you find a greater responsibility to all the people of our country.

Mr. BORAH. No; you find no greater responsibility. The responsibility for the maintenance and preservation of this Government rests right down there among those people. If you do not find sufficient patriotism and wisdom and intelligence to take care of that situation down there, you will not find it up here.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to make a suggestion, Congress did at one time find that elections throughout the country were held at different times—in some States in August, I think, in some States in June, in some States in September, in some States in October, and in some States in November. Does the Senator not think that it was unwise that elections for Representatives should be scattered along through the year in that way and does not the Senator think that it is wise on the part of Congress to provide, as it has provided, that all such elections should be held in all the States upon the same day?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think it was eminently wise to provide that all elections should be held upon the same day; but where did that wisdom come from? The Senator argues that it came from up here somewhere. The fact of the business is that the States had been working through years and years for this unity of elections, and when Congress got ready to act upon the matter, Congress yielded to several of the States, which did not desire to come in, as to time; and we find Vermont and some of the States holding their elections at such time as the wisdom of their people deemed best.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But, Mr. President, it was found that the States acting severally would not do that, and it required that the States should come together in Congress in order to bring about that reform.

Mr. BORAH. I disagree with the Senator that it was found that the States would not act wisely or together upon that proposition.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They did not act.

Mr. BORAH. The States were together upon the proposition, and the practical unanimity which did exist at the time the act of Congress was passed arose out of action upon the part of the States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They were about 80 years getting to it. They did not get to it until Congress acted.

Mr. BORAH. We have been a hundred years in trying to get this joint resolution through.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And it will be a hundred years more, if the simple proposition to elect Senators by direct vote of the people is encumbered with race riders and other constitutional limitations which do not belong in the present controversy at all. I favor the amendment, but want to strip it of burdens which it should not bear.

Mr. BORAH. No; it will not be a hundred years more, for there is an influence at work now which will change that situation; that is, the people have the notion that they want it, and are going to have it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The question I was going to ask the Senator was, Does the Senator feel any apprehension that the Congress of the United States would, if it continued to possess this power, act unwisely or unjustly in fixing general rules? If he does not think so, what advantage is there to be gained in changing the Constitution in that respect?

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, that calls for a declaration on my part which perhaps I ought not to make, but in order to be candid with the Senator I will make it. I think that Congress acted eminently unwisely at one time when they undertook to do that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Undertook to do what?

Mr. BORAH. When they undertook to do that. I am one of those who would like, if I could, to take a part of the history of the Republican Party with reference to the reconstruction days out of its history and burn it, and blot it from the memory of men.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. You might eliminate a few things from the record of our opponents and thus improve the veracity of history.

Mr. BORAH. I think that the wisdom of these things rests down with the people, and that it is impossible for us to exercise a greater wisdom about it than the wisdom of those whom it locally concerns. If it is a local matter, as I believe a popular election to be, then we will never show greater wisdom than the people in the several States.

It is not national in its scope; it is local in its nature, and the National Government never can deal with a local matter as intelligently as the people of the States can deal with it. That has been the history of this Government from the beginning until now. Whenever the National Government undertakes to deal from Washington with a local matter it makes a mistake. The Senator from Utah would not desire the National Government to step in and run a popular election in his State any more than the people in any other part of the country would. I have no doubt that he would protest against such action just as quickly as anyone else. We have got now out in the great West some of the effects of a government from Washington with reference to local affairs, and, so far as I am concerned, I do not want any more of it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I entirely agree with the Senator that the General Government ought not to interfere in local affairs and that each State ought to be left to deal with its own local affairs. The difference between the Senator and myself arises from the fact that he regards the election of a United States Senator, who is an official of the National Government as well as of the State, as a purely local affair, while I regard it not only as a matter which concerns each of the States, but a matter which concerns them all.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not regard the election of a United States Senator as a local affair, but I regard the manner of holding the election where he is elected as purely a local affair. I contend that there can be no such thing as a national interest in the manner of holding a popular election in a State. So far as it has a national interest, the Government of the United States can take care of it, notwithstanding this proposed change.

The minority views further say:

> Seventh. It has been contended by some that even if the provision of the Constitution conferring upon Congress the authority to regulate the times and manner of the election of Senators shall be eliminated, full power will still exist under other general provisions. We are unable to agree with this contention. Under the resolution express power is granted to the States to regulate this subject.

That is, regulate the manner—

> The language is exclusive; the whole power is granted to the State, and nothing whatever upon this subject is reserved to Congress.

The inference of this argument is that the whole power with reference to the election is granted to the States, while, as a matter of fact, we grant nothing to the States except the proposition of fixing the time and prescribing the manner—

> To expressly grant exclusive power over the subject to the State governments is equivalent to a denial of the same power to the General Government, and nothing can be clearer than that such express and exclusive grant would foreclose the General Government from exercising the same power under any general language contained in the Constitution.

Then how does it arise that when we have granted to the States the right to fix the manner for presidential electors, the National Government exercises its power over those elections? The confusion arises, as I said a moment ago, out of using the word "manner" for "the right to vote" or the right to protect an election from fraud or violence or anything which interferes with a fair count.

Mr. President, I want, as briefly as I can now, to submit three propositions and the well-established law which sustains them:

The first proposition is that the State alone can determine the qualifications of the voter. The National Government has no power, aside from the proposition of preventing discrimination, to interfere with any qualification which the State fixes with reference to the voter. Whenever the State determines who shall vote at an election, if there is no element of discrimination such as is covered by the fifteenth amendment, Congress can not interfere with the action of the State. This question is so well established that I need only call attention to the authorities. Perhaps it would not be necessary to do that, except as it serves as a basis upon which to build the argument I desire to make. I here call attention to some of the authorities on the first proposition:

The United States has no voters in the States of its own creation. The elective officers of the United States are all elected directly or indirectly by State voters. The Members of the House of Representatives are to be chosen by the people of the States and the electors in each State must have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature. * * * The amendment (the fourteenth) did not add to the privileges and immunities of a citizen. * * * No new voters were necessarily made by it. Indirectly it may have had that effect because it may have increased the number of citizens entitled to suffrage under the constitution and laws of the States, but it operates for this purpose, if at all, through States and the State laws and not directly upon the citizen. (Miner v. Happersett, 21 Wall, 178.)

The fifteenth amendment does not confer the right of suffrage upon anyone. It prevents the States or the United States, however, from giving preference in this particular to one citizen of the United States over another on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Before its adoption this could be done. It was as much within the power of the State to exclude a citizen of the United States from voting on account of race, etc., as it was on account of age, property, or education. Now, it is not. If citizens of one race having certain qualifications are permitted by law to vote, those of another having the same qualifications must be. Previous to this amendment there was no constitutional guaranty against this discrimination; now there is. It follows that the amendment has invested the citizens of the United States with a new constitutional right which is within the protecting power of Congress. That right is exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. This under the express provisions of the second section of the amendment Congress may enforce by appropriate legislation. (United States v. Reese, 92 U. S., 214.)

We hold that the fifteenth amendment has invested the citizens of the United States with a new constitutional right, which is exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. From this it appears that the right of suffrage is not a necessary attribute of national citizenship, but that exemption from discrimination in the exercise of that right on account of race, etc., is. The right to vote in the State comes from the States. But the right of exemption from the prohibited discrimination comes from the United States. (United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S., 555.)

The privilege to vote in any State is not given by the Federal Constitution or by any of its amendments. It is not a privilege springing from citizenship of the United States. It may not be refused on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, but it does not follow from mere citizenship of the United States. In other words, the privilege to vote in a State is within the jurisdiction of the State itself, to be exercised as the State may direct and upon such terms as to it may seem proper, provided, of course, no discrimination is made between individuals in violation of the Federal Constitution. The State might provide that persons of foreign birth could vote without being naturalized. Some States permit women to vote; others refuse them that privilege. A State, so far as the Federal Constitution is concerned, might provide by its own constitution and laws that none but native-born citizens should be permitted to vote, as the Federal Constitution does not confer the right of suffrage upon anyone, and the conditions under which that right is to be exercised are matters for the States alone to prescribe, subject to the conditions of the Federal Constitution already stated, although it may be observed that the right to vote for a Member of Congress is not derived exclusively from the State law. But the elector must be one entitled to vote under the State statutes. (Pope v. Williams, 193 U. S., 632.)

Whenever the State has acted and the qualification is fixed, then the National Government may throw what protection it sees fit around that voter when he comes to cast his vote for a Federal officer; and that may be done, as was said in the Yarbrough case, whether Article I, section 4, is in the Constitution or not; it may be done because it is a right dependent upon and guaranteed by the Constitution. Permit me to read here just one quotation from the Yarbrough case:

It is not correct to say that the right to vote for a Member of Congress does not depend on the Constitution of the United States.

The office, if it be properly called an office, is created by that Constitution, and by that alone. It also declares how it shall be filled, namely, by election. * * *

The States in prescribing the qualifications of voters for the most numerous branch of their own legislatures do not do this with reference to the election for Members of Congress. Nor can they prescribe the qualification for voters for those eo nomine. They define who are to vote for the popular branch of their own legislature, and the Constitution of the United States says the same persons shall vote for Members of Congress in that State. It adopts the qualification thus furnished as the qualification of its own electors for Members of Congress.

It is not true, therefore, that electors for Members of Congress owe their right to vote to the State law in any sense which makes the exercise of the right to depend exclusively on the law of the State. (Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U. S., p. 663, etc.)

The qualification and the status of the voter once being fixed by the State, then his right to cast that vote for Congressman or for Senator, in case this resolution is adopted, is a right dependent upon and guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States.

This joint resolution provides:

The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

After the State fixes the qualification and status of the voter, then the right to cast that vote for a United States Senator, if this amendment should be adopted and finally become a part of the Constitution, would be a right dependent upon the Constitution of the United States and guaranteed by it, and Congress would have the power to protect and assure any elector the exercise of that right. While the National Government could not in the first instance say who should vote, yet after the State should determine who its voters were, then the National Government can step in and guarantee to everyone whose status has been fixed by the State the right to exercise that franchise; and this may be done by any law which, in the wisdom of Congress, it deems sufficient to accomplish that purpose.

A distinction is to be made between the right to vote for a Representative to Congress and the conditions upon which that right is granted. In the preceding section it has been shown that the right to vote is conditioned upon and determined by State law. But the right itself, as thus determined, is a Federal right. That is to say, the right springs from the provision of the Federal Constitution that Representatives shall be elected by those who have the right in each State to vote for members of the most numerous branch of the State legislature. The Constitution thus gives the right, but accepts as its own the qualifications which the States severally see fit to establish with reference to the election of the most numerous branch of their several State legislatures. (Willoughby on the Constitution, vol. 1, p. 540.)

We deem it unnecessary to add anything to the views expressed in these opinions. We are fully sensible of the great wrong which results from bribery at elections, and do not question the power of Congress to punish such offenses when committed in respect to the election of Federal officials. At the same time it is all important that a criminal statute should define clearly the offense which it purports to punish, and that when so defined it should be within the limits of the power of the legislative body enacting it. Congress has no power to punish bribery at all elections. The limits of its power are in respect to elections in which the Nation is directly interested. (James v. Bowman, 190 U. S., p. 142.)

The case which I now cite was an action to recover damages for a wrongful refusal to permit the plaintiff to vote. The sole question was whether or not the case involved a question under the Constitution of the United States, and the court held that it did, saying:

It is manifest from the context of the opinion in the case just referred to that the conclusion that the cause was one arising under the Constitution of the United States was predicated on the conception that the action sought the vindication or protection of the right to vote for a Member of Congress, a right "fundamentally based upon the Constitution of the United States, which created the office of Member of Congress, and declared that it should be elective, and pointed out the means of ascertaining who should be electors." That is to say, the ruling was that the case was equally one arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States, whether the illegal act complained of arose from a charged violation of some specific provision of the Constitution or laws of the United States or from the violation of a State law which affected the exercise of the right to vote for a Member of Congress, since the Constitution of the United States had adopted as the qualifications of electors for Members of Congress those prescribed by the State for electors of the most numerous branch of the legislature of the State. (Swafford v. Templeton, 185 U. S., p. 492.)

There are other cases to that effect which I will not take the time of the Senate to read.

After the qualification has been fixed, then it becomes a right guaranteed by the Constitution, and the Federal Government can protect that right in any manner in which it sees fit. It can protect it just the same as it can protect any other right which is guaranteed under the Constitution of the United States. If you go out upon the public lands and undertake to acquire title to public lands, the Federal Government can protect your right so long as you are undertaking to do that, for that is a right dependent upon the Constitution. If you are arrested by a United States marshal and some individual citizen attacks you while in the custody of the marshal, the United States Government may protect you, because you have a right under the Constitution, so long as you are in the custody of a United States officer, to be protected from individual assault, and the Supreme Court has so held. Any right dependent upon that instrument, any right guaranteed by it, any right which has its existence by reason of it, may be protected in any manner which the wisdom of this body, together with that of the other body, sees fit to suggest.

We do not need Article I, section 4, to protect the purity of elections, to protect them against fraud. But with it we can go into the States and change the registry system; we can prescribe the form of the ballot; things which we ought not to do. That is the reason I am opposed to the turning over or the leaving with the Federal Government the power to prescribe those things and control those things which are purely local in every sense of the word.

The right being one protected by the Constitution of the United States, Congress may pass any law necessary to insure the exercise and enjoyment of that right. Justice Harlan, in one of his opinions, has said:

It is no longer open to question in this court that Congress may by appropriate legislation protect any right or privilege arising from, created or secured by, or dependent upon the Constitution or laws of the United States.

In the case of Logan v. United States, found in One hundred and forty-fourth United States, there is an exhaustive review of all the questions upon this subject, and after a full review of the authorities the court lays down this as the rule which is now thoroughly established by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States:

Every right created by, arising under, or dependent upon the Constitution of the United States may be protected and enforced by Congress by such means and in such manner as Congress, in the exercise of the correlative duty of protection, or of the legislative powers conferred upon it by the Constitution, may in its discretion deem most eligible and best adapted to attain the object.

This decision was based upon an indictment founded upon section 5508 for assaulting a person who was in the custody of a United States marshal, the court holding that the prisoner had a right to be protected against assault while in the custody of a Federal officer, and the party assaulting him could be prosecuted under this section of the statute—5508.

Rights and immunities created by or dependent upon the Constitution of the United States can be protected by Congress. The form and the manner of the protection may be such as Congress, in the legitimate exercise of its legislative discretion, shall provide. These may be varied to meet the necessities of the particular right to be protected. (U. S. v. Reese, 92 U. S., 217.)

It is undoubtedly a sound position that whenever a right is guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States, Congress has the power to provide for its enforcement either by implication arising from the correlative duty of Government to protect wherever a right to a citizen is conferred or under the general power contained in Article I, section 8. (U. S. v. Cruikshank, 1 Woods, 308.)

The fact that section 5508 was not passed under and by virtue of Article I, section 4, or dependent upon it for validity, is clearly shown in the following case of United States v. Waddell. This is a case where a party was prosecuted for interfering with another who was seeking the right of acquiring a homestead upon the unoccupied public lands of the United States, and the indictment was upheld:

Whenever the acts complained of are of a character to prevent this, or throw obstruction in the way of exercising this right, and for the purpose and with intent to prevent it, or to injure or oppress a person because he has exercised it, then, because it is a right asserted under the law of the United States and granted by that law, those acts come within the purview of the statute and of the constitutional power of Congress to make such statute. In the language of the court in Ex parte Yarbrough: "The power arises out of the circumstance that the function in which the party is engaged, or the right which he is about to exercise, is dependent on the laws of the United States. In both of these cases it is the duty of that Government to see that he may exercise this right freely, and to protect him from violence while so doing, or on account of so doing."

This language is as applicable to the present case as it is to that. (U. S. v. Waddell, 112 U. S., 80.)

Mr. President, a few words now as to the general question and then I am done. I do not know whether this resolution will prevail at this time or not. I shall be exceedingly pleased if it does. I shall not be discouraged if it does not. I do know that the fight will never cease until the people are given an opportunity to vote upon this subject, for we are not asking and can not ask for an amendment to the Constitution; we are only asking and can only ask that the people be given a right to vote upon the amendment. Unsettled questions have no pity for the contentment of mankind. For nearly a hundred years this question has been seriously debated among the people. For more than 50 years there has been an earnest and persistent demand that the matter be submitted to a vote in the respective legislatures. Thirty-two States of the Union have in some form of resolution called for this change. Millions of people have in some form or other asked that we submit it. To deny this right to have it submitted is to repudiate the first principles of a free government. To refuse the people the right after this long-standing, earnest, patient plea to vote upon modifications of their Government is to plant the seeds of distrust and dissatisfaction in the minds of those without whose loyalty and confidence we have no government. It is unwise. It is the most disastrous course which men who would preserve the underlying principles of our Government could possibly take. It is a defiant challenge of the people to have a voice in their Government. Men who would not give the right even to vote upon such a subject would, undoubtedly, if they could, deny the people any say or voice in matters of government.

It has been declared many times that there is no public or general demand for this change in the Constitution; that the people do not want it. It is urged with much scorn and more voice that the movement has its support with a few men who are seeking cheap notoriety. Those men who so declare, by refusing to submit the question, convict by their own act their words of insincerity. Such insincere and fallacious assertions can never mislead any mind except the self-infatuated minds which give them birth. This amendment can never be adopted unless there is an overwhelming public sentiment for it. It requires three-fourths of the States to adopt; it only requires one-fourth to defeat. Are you not willing to submit the matter where the people must win by such great odds if they win at all? If there is no public sentiment, no earnest, widespread, public demand, then there is no danger of submission. On the other hand, if there are three-fourths of the States of the Union in favor of it, who will be so bold as to say that they are not to have a chance to vote upon it? The fact is that those who oppose this measure, while professing great reverence and love for the Constitution, nevertheless defy it. The right to amend the Constitution is just as much a part of the Constitution, just as obligatory upon men sworn to support it, as any other part of that instrument. When the people petition for the exercise of this power, and through long years and repeated exertions seek the right so given, to deny it is to deny them a right guaranteed by the Constitution.

But those who oppose this measure seem unwilling to submit to the crucial test of truth—that is, debate before the tribunal which is to finally decide it. If Senators who think this change unwise have faith in their arguments; if they believe that experience and reason and patriotism are against the change, will they not then consent to pass this contest from this forum to the forum of public opinion? If you are not afraid of your cause, and if you do not distrust your argument by which you seek to sustain your position, then it must be that you distrust the judgment and the patriotism of that tribunal to which you are asked to submit it. If one or the other were not true, you would at least be willing to give the people a chance to vote. A man who will not submit his cause to a tribunal created to determine such matters in an orderly way knows or feels either that his cause is not just or that the tribunal is unfit.

At the last session, while this question was before us, we listened to a most polished and effective eulogy by the Senator from Massachusetts upon the men who framed the Constitution. I agree with him fully in all he says in respect to the character and ability, the unselfish devotion, and unmatched patriotism of that remarkable group of men. I do not expect time to record the appearance of another Hamilton any sooner than it will record the appearance of another Shakespeare. I do not expect the future to see another Madison any sooner than it will see the return of a Robert Burns. Mr. President, if I could see this Government operate just as the fathers made it, I would never challenge their wisdom nor stray for one moment from the path they pointed out to their children. I do not want any different principles of government than the principles which they indorsed and approved, but I do want those. I want to see the old Government brought back to where they left it—in the absolute control of the people, operating alone in their behalf. Whatever changes in details are necessary to accomplish this we ought to make.

The first 70 years of the Republic are gone. They were years in which there were no influences sufficiently strong to prevent the powers of government from operating in the manner in which the fathers expected them to operate. They were years in which there were no influences sufficiently strong to turn the agencies of government into the agencies of particular interests or to wholly private and selfish purposes. But that is not true now. The last 40 years have worked a marvelous change. We have other influences to deal with. We have influences of which they never dreamed, influences stronger in wealth and power than the Government itself at that time. These things do not require changes in the principles of the fathers, but they do require readjustment and a redistribution of powers. They require the adaptation of government to modern conditions. They require that we accept the wisdom of the fathers as a guide for brave, strong men confronted with a new condition of affairs, and not as a fetich before which slavish devotees bow in nerveless, lethargic adoration.

Mr. Madison said in the constitutional convention:

If an election by the people or through any other channel than the State legislature promised as incorrupt and impartial a preference there could surely be no necessity for an appointment by those legislatures.

Had he been able to see what we see and know what we know, with that idea revolving in his mind, what do you think the father of the Constitution would have done? Had he looked upon vacant chairs here because of deadlocks in the legislature; had he seen as we saw last winter nearly one-half of a State legislature fleeing like fugitives across a State line and then negotiating with their colleagues like contending foes; had the men who surrounded Madison passed through the filth and corruption through which this Senate has been delving its way this last year; had they been thwarted and frustrated and defied in the effort to secure facts concerning the integrity of an election; had they believed that State legislatures would be turned by this duty from lawmaking bodies dealing conscientiously with affairs of state into political combinations, torn and distracted by purely convention duties, venalized and corrupted by powerful interests who care nothing for the State, but everything for the membership of this body; if they had seen what we see, does any man doubt, in view of their declarations, that the fathers would have taken this duty from the legislature and given it directly to the people? The things which the fathers did are not right merely because they did them, but they, too, must stand the test of reason and the test of time and experience. I repeat, sir, that I join with those who give praise and honor to the fathers. But I do not believe in that kind of hero worship which makes the worshipers the nerveless, spineless, slavish devotees of a dead past. I believe in the hero worship which vitalizes and inspires, which realizes that all the great names which adorn the past are as sounding brass and tinkling cymbals, except as they inspire us for those achievements which in the language of Mr. Lincoln serves to keep the jewel of liberty in the family of men.

Those who are seeking to bring about this reform are not disturbed by the charge of being demagogues or sensation hunters or slaves to popular sentiment. The world has always had to deal with a very large and a very respectable class of people whose intellectual orbs are in the back of their head, and the rest of the world has learned patience and tolerance because of their affliction. There were able and brilliant and patriotic men who plead for the old Confederacy and against the adoption of the Constitution. A few weeks ago there was a great debate in the Senate of China over dispensing with the Chinaman's queue. The progressives favored the measure. The regulars, loyal to the institutions of the fathers, plead for the maintenance of those customs under which they had prospered and grown to power. To dispense with the queue would be to strike at the very foundation of civil liberty and to turn the future over to an unthinking horde of sensation hunters trailing after new fads and worshiping in strange temples. It was a great debate, and men were moved to great feats of oratorical power.

I do not recall these things in disrespect of those who differ from us on this question. I only want to remind them that questions like this can not be met by charging its advocates with insincerity and demagogy. This question can only be met by argument, by reason, by a plea to the consciences and convictions of men. Those who favor this change are determined and uncompromising. They will never quit until the cause is decreed against them in the only forum which has jurisdiction to render final judgment. Realizing that they must have two-thirds of the votes of Congress, that they must have three-fourths of the States, that they must meet able and determined opposition, that they must win against a thousand conservative forces—even with this handicap they are anxious for the final test of battle. They are willing to submit this to the judgment and intelligence of the American people. Notoriety could be secured by easier and cheaper methods; sensations could be more easily obtained; but, armed with a just cause, encouraged in the belief that a question is never settled until it is settled right, those who urge this measure will continue to do so until it is written by the hand of public opinion into the great charter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to the substitute offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to enter upon any extended argument on the general question or upon this particular amendment. It has been so short a time since I addressed the Senate somewhat at length upon this subject that I should be reluctant to do so, even if present conditions did not make it inadvisable that I should attempt it.

I desire simply now to present an amendment, which I trust may meet some of the objections urged by Senators to the joint resolution as it came from the Judiciary Committee. The joint resolution as it came from the Judiciary Committee, so far as it affects the particular question relating to the control of the times, places, and manner of holding the elections is in these words, to be found on page 2 of the joint resolution as reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, which is, in fact, verbatim the joint resolution as it came from the House. The language of the joint resolution, so far as it relates to that particular feature, is as follows:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

The substitute proposed by the Senator from Kansas leaves out those words and leaves the question of the control of the times, places, and manner of holding the election as now expressed in the Constitution, in the fourth section, which is as follows:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

That language does not occur in the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas, but the effect of the adoption of his substitute would be to incorporate that language in the substitute offered by him.

The amendment proposed by me is as follows:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may make such regulations in any State whenever the legislature thereof shall neglect or refuse to make such regulations, or from any circumstances be incapable of making the same.

That amendment, Mr. President, it will be seen, completely provides against the contingency which has been urged with great force and earnestness, in which the State might fail to make regulations for the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators, and in consequence of its failure and also of a sufficient number of other States, there would be, as stated by various Senators in their arguments upon this floor, a failure to elect Senators, and in that case the wheels of the Government would practically be arrested.

Now, Mr. President, in offering that amendment I have followed the utterances of all the conventions of the States when they had before them the question whether or not they would adopt the Constitution and become parts of the Government which it was proposed to form, organize, and operate under that Constitution. When the Constitution was submitted to the various States there were sundry objections made by different conventions of those States, some objecting to one feature and some to another, all of them, however, objections, which were finally withdrawn.

I think I may safely say that there was but one single provision in the Constitution to which all of the States objected; but one single provision of the Constitution to which all of the States urged serious objections and criticisms; a provision to which they, every State—the records of which have been preserved—objected. The provision thus objected to is that which gives to Congress the ultimate power to regulate the times, places, and manner of electing Members of Congress. All of the States made formal protest to this particular provision and finally agreed to the Constitution, subject to the assurance that the powers conferred by this provision would only be used to the extent as expressed in the amendment which I have to-day offered, to wit, that the power to regulate the manner of elections would only be exercised when the State legislatures failed or refused to make the necessary regulations, or were for any reason incapable of making them.

I want to say, Mr. President, that the language of this amendment is copied almost verbatim, and in the essential part of it verbatim, from the resolution which was adopted by the convention of the State of New York when it adopted the Constitution.

I am going to read, sir, although I did so upon a former occasion, the utterances of these various conventions on this subject at the time they acted upon the question whether or not they would adopt the Constitution of the United States and become a part of the Government formed thereby. I read those to the Senate in February last when I addressed the Senate somewhat at length upon this subject. I read then from the original documents, which I then had before me. I now read from a correct copy of those utterances by those several conventions.

The convention of the State of South Carolina used this language when it passed upon the question of the adoption of the Constitution. In its articles of adoption the State said:

> And whereas it is essential to the preservation of the rights reserved to the several States, and the freedom of the people, under the operation of a General Government that the right of prescribing the manner, time, and places of holding the elections to the Federal Legislature should be forever inseparably annexed to the sovereignty of the several States: This convention doth declare that the same ought to remain to all posterity a perpetual and fundamental right in the local exclusive of the interference of the General Government, except in cases where the legislatures of the States shall refuse or neglect to perform and fulfill the same according to the tenor of said Constitution.

The State of Virginia, in its act of June 26, 1788, adopting the Constitution, used this language:

That Congress shall not alter, modify, or interfere in the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, or either of them, except when the legislature of any State shall neglect, refuse, or be disabled by invasion or rebellion to prescribe the same.

North Carolina adopted the Constitution in 1789, and in so doing used the same language that Virginia did, each of them expressing the same idea, that this dangerous grant of power in the Federal Government was only to provide against the contingency that the States themselves should refuse or fail to exercise it, and that Congress should not interfere in prescribing the times, places, and manner of holding elections except when the legislature of any State should neglect or refuse or be incapable to prescribe the same.

The State of New York, from which, as I said, I have copied this amendment, although it is almost in the same language in the resolutions adopted by the other States, ratified the Constitution on the 28th of July, 1788, and used this language in the act of ratification:

Under these impressions—

Which had been previously stated in the resolution—

Under these impressions and declaring that the rights aforesaid can not be abridged or violated, and that the explanations aforesaid are consistent with the said Constitution, and in confidence that the amendments which shall have been proposed to the said Constitution shall receive an early and mature consideration, we, the said delegates * * * do by these presents assent to and ratify the said Constitution.

In full confidence, nevertheless, that until a convention shall be called and convened for proposing amendments to the Constitution * * * that the Congress will not make or alter any regulation in this State respecting the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives unless the legislature in this State shall neglect or refuse to make laws or regulations for the purpose, or from any circumstances be incapable of making the same, and that in those cases such power will duly be exercised until the legislature of this State shall make provisions in the premises.

Rhode Island, June 26, 1790, used the same language as did the State of New York—only stronger.

Pennsylvania said, in the article adopting the Constitution:

That Congress shall not have power to make or alter regulations concerning the time, place, and manner of electing Senators and Representatives, except in case of neglect or refusal by the State to make regulations for the purpose, and then only for such time as such neglect or refusal shall continue.

The State of Massachusetts, February 6, 1789, used this language:

That Congress do not exercise the powers vested in them by the fourth section of the first article, but in cases when a State shall neglect or refuse to make the regulations therein mentioned, or shall make regulations subversive of the rights of the people to a free and equal representation in Congress, agreeably to the Constitution.

And Massachusetts, in the same document, went on to say:

And the convention do, in the name and in behalf of the people of this Commonwealth, enjoin it upon their Representatives in Congress at all times, until the alterations and provisions aforesaid have been considered agreeably to the fifth article of said Constitution, to exert all their influence and use all reasonable and legal methods to obtain a ratification of said alterations and provisions, in such manner as is provided in said article.

New Hampshire ratified on June 21, 1788, and used in recommendation the same language as did Massachusetts.

Now, Mr. President, as I stated upon the former occasion, it will be recollected that after the action of the convention in framing the Constitution there was great contention in the country whether or not the Constitution should be adopted or whether the States should remain under the old Articles of Confederation, and there was great division among them, as has been stated here to-day. Among the foremost of those who advocated the adoption of the Constitution were Alexander Hamilton and James Madison. They contributed very largely to the literature of that day in the advocacy of the adoption of the Constitution.

They had to meet the contention which was then being presented in the several conventions of the States to the effect that to give the General Government the unrestricted power to legislate as to the times, places, and manner of holding these elections was to confer upon the General Government a power inconsistent with that which was conceived to be to the interests and safety and the perpetuity of the liberties of the people of the several States.

How did they meet that contention? Did they meet it by contending for what Senators here contend for—that there should be this power in the General Government in order that in times when political or party exigency may demand it the General Government may lay its powerful hand upon the States and control and regulate the elections in those States through registrars and supervisors and judges of election, with their authority supported at the polls by marshals and deputy marshals and if need be by the military forces of the United States?

Did these prominent advocates of the adoption of the Constitution make any such contention? Did they attempt to justify any such proposition before the conventions of the several States when they were called upon to decide the vital question whether or not the Government should be formed? By no means, Mr. President. Sir, there is no man who can read the debates of that day, there is no man who can read the official action as embodied in the utterances of the conventions of that day, who can doubt for a moment that if Alexander Hamilton and James Madison had taken any such position before the country the new Constitution would have been repudiated; and the several conventions, headed by the convention in New York, followed by practically all the other States, would have said: Whatever may be advantages to be had under this proposed general government, so long as you contend for the right of the General Government to interfere with the elections in the States to prescribe the times and the manner and the places, regardless of whether we have performed that duty or not, we reject the proposed constitution.

No Senator who has ever read those debates, not only the debates of the Constitutional Convention but the debates in the several conventions of the States, can rise in his place to-day and say he has read them and believes for a moment that a single one of these States would have adopted the Constitution with any such proposition embodied in it.

Alexander Hamilton knew that fact; James Madison knew that fact; and consequently they met the objection of these States, not by justifying the proposition that the General Government should have the right to interfere, but by solemnly asserting that the only purpose was to use a necessary power when the States themselves refused or neglected to avail themselves of the opportunity. Therefore it was that Alexander Hamilton and James Madison, in their effort to have the Constitution adopted by the several States, gave the assurance, which I am about to read, which was published throughout the country and doubtless had largely its influence in constraining the conventions of the several States to agree to the Constitution with the broad grant of power in it, full of confidence that it was only to be exercised in such way as these fathers of the Constitution assured them it would only be exercised.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. CLAPP. I have listened to the Senator with a great deal of interest. Would not the argument which he is making more properly apply to a proposed plan of legislation under the existing terms of the Constitution rather than to the proposition of abandoning those provisions in the Constitution? I am unable to see——

Mr. BACON. This does not abandon it. If the Senator had heard the amendment read which I offered, he will see that it still retains the power in the General Government but limits its exercise to a case where the States themselves shall fail to perform their duty in that particular.

Mr. CLAPP. But beginning primarily, the proposition of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] in its present form, if it amounted to anything in that respect, would be an abandonment of certain provisions which are in the Constitution, whereas the proposition of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] would simply retain those provisions of the Constitution which were put in at the time the Constitution was adopted. As to what was meant by those provisions and when those provisions should be invoked by Congress, it seems to me would apply with more force to proposed legislation carrying them into effect than the question which is now before us, as to whether they should be abandoned or retained under this new plan.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I had not intended to go into that branch of the discussion, and I am a little reluctant to do it now, but still I will, if the Senator will pardon me until I get to that particular point.

I do not think the point I was exactly on at that time relates to the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota. The point I am on is simply this: I had read what had been uttered by the conventions of the several States showing that they objected to the language as presented in the Constitution, and as now found in the Constitution, because they conceived that it was capable of the construction which has been put upon it since that time, which gave to Congress the power to prescribe not only the times and the places but the manner, and in prescribing the manner necessarily prescribing all the details with reference to an election. They then recognized that in prescribing the manner of holding and conducting these elections Congress would have the power to enact registration laws; that it would have the power to appoint registrars, to appoint supervisors of election, to appoint judges of election and returning boards to certify the results; not only so, but also to order officials of the executive department of the Government to enforce the law in that respect, to uphold at the polls the authority of registrars and supervisors and judges, and not only the power to thus invest civil officers with the authority to thus enforce the law, but with the power necessarily to order the soldiers of the United States for the purpose of upholding the civil authority.

That was the view which the several States took of the possibility of this clause in the Constitution. They objected to it most strenuously. They contended that that was a right which belonged to each State. There was then no cloud upon the horizon which indicated the coming of a sectional storm. It was not to guard against any special and particular evil which was apprehended, but those rugged men who had so recently been through a contest by means of which they had achieved their liberty stood more than a hundred years nearer to the times of autocratic rule than we stand. They stood more than a hundred years nearer the exhibition of great central power, situated beyond their borders and controlling their local affairs. They had devoted seven years in proclaiming their rights to free themselves of such outside domination, and while there was then no particular menace from any particular quarter, they were grounded in the great fundamental proposition that they should control absolutely their own local affairs, and most particularly their elections, and that no general government should ever assume to control those local affairs for them.

Therefore it was that they objected to this clause in the Constitution with the possibilities of which I have spoken, possibilities then, but realities since in this country; possibilities then, but realities in laws which have at one time stood upon our statute books for twenty-odd years without the ability of the people to remove themselves from such tyranny and such oppression; possibilities then, but almost realities afterwards in the bill known as the force bill, which passed the House and which came to this body and only after a long time was defeated, not by a direct vote, but by a flank movement—through a vote in the Senate to pass to the consideration of another bill.

Thus it was, I say, that the people of that day viewed possibilities, and even in the absence of anything which was then presented as a probability, in the absence of anything which was visible and tangible, they stood upon an abstract right and upon a fundamental proposition and said they could not be moved from it, and they would have refused to form the Government rather than to surrender the principle or to run the danger involved in its abandonment.

Now, the advocates of the adoption of the Constitution saw that difficulty. It had to be met. If they had met it by an advocacy of the proposition, they would have failed in that contest. They met it by giving the most solemn assurances to the several States that it was a power never to be exercised except when the States themselves refused or neglected to exercise it. Alexander Hamilton and James Madison, the great apostles of the adoption of the Constitution, both gave their solemn pledge. Under such a solemn pledge the State of New York, the State of Massachusetts, the State of New Jersey, the State of Rhode Island, the State of New Hampshire, the State of Pennsylvania, the State of Virginia, the State of North Carolina, and the State of South Carolina, and all the States of which we have the record, all gave their adhesion in the adoption of the Constitution, while at the same time giving the utterances of their confidence in the observance of that assurance and pledge.

All this amendment does, Mr. President, is to ask that the Congress of the United States should to-day observe that pledge.

Now, what did Alexander Hamilton say about this at a time when the thing hung in the balance, when it was doubtful whether or not the States could be reconciled to this great invasion of the right of each State to control its own elections, and when there was danger that the work of the convention would go to pieces and there would be no Government of the United States formed? Under these solemn circumstances, in the face of such a danger, to avoid possible ruin and shipwreck in the work of framing the proposed government, Alexander Hamilton said this. Madison came first, but as I spoke of Hamilton I will read what Hamilton said in the fifty-eighth number of the Federalist.

The Federalist was made up of papers which were then circulated and read from one end of this country to the other, and upon which the people in the States and the public men at the conventions relied as that upon which they could securely depend without fear that it would afterwards be disregarded. Number after number was issued arguing why the convention of each State should adopt the Constitution and why the Constitution should be the foundation upon which should rest the new Government. Alexander Hamilton, in the fifty-eighth number of the Federalist, used this language:

> They (the convention) have submitted the regulation of elections for the Federal Government in the first instance to the local administrations, which, in ordinary cases and when no improper views prevail, may be both more convenient and more satisfactory; but they have reserved to the national authority a right to interpose whenever extraordinary circumstances might render that interposition necessary to its safety.

What Hamilton meant by this general language is sufficiently shown in the specific language used by the convention of New York, which I have already quoted and read to the Senate, of which convention Hamilton was a most active and conspicuous member. The "safety" to which he alluded was the necessity for the General Government to have the power to act if the States refused or neglected to do so.

I will say the context and all the contemporaneous publications and all the debates show that the safety to which he alluded was necessary to guard against the same contingency of which the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] spoke in his speech during the last session of Congress, the fear that by reason of the omission of the State to provide proper machinery there could not be brought to the Chambers of Congress the Senators and the Representatives who were required in order that the Government might be carried on.

Mr. Madison used this language in the convention of Virginia:

> It was found necessary to leave the regulation of these (times, places, and manner) in the first places to the State governments as being best acquainted with the situation of the people, subject to the control of the General Government, in order to enable it to produce uniformity and prevent its own dissolution * * *. Were they exclusively under the control of the State governments, the General Government might easily be dissolved. But if they be regulated properly by the State legislatures, the congressional control will very probably never be exercised.

John Jay, afterwards Chief Justice of the United States, in discussing in the New York convention, of which he was a member, this provision of the Constitution, used this language:

> That every government was imperfect unless it had a power of preserving itself. Suppose that by design or accident the States should neglect to appoint the Representatives, certainly there should be some constitutional remedy for this evil. The obvious meaning of the paragraph was that, if this neglect should take place, Congress should have power by law to support the Government, and prevent the dissolution of the Union. He believed this was the design of the Federal convention.

Mr. Madison, in the Madison Papers, used this language in regard to this section:

> This was meant to give the National Legislature a power not only to alter the provisions of the State, but to make regulations in case the States should fail or refuse altogether.

Mr. Madison was also a member of the Virginia convention, which, in adopting the Constitution, used the explicit language upon this question which I have already quoted and read to the Senate.

Mr. President, whatever may be said as to whether or not any of this language is ambiguous, certainly the impression made and the undertaking understood by the conventions of the States was in exact accordance with the language which I have read from the resolutions adopted by these conventions; and each one of the several States from whose convention proceedings I have read, not in ambiguous language, but in the most perfect and concise and unqualified language, adopted the Constitution with the assurance which they had from the utterances of the public men of that day, that, while it was possible that there could be this broad construction of the language giving this power to Congress, it was not the intention or purpose that Congress should exercise this power except in cases where the States themselves failed to use it; and their adoption was conditioned upon their confidence that this pledge would be sacredly kept.

For that reason, Mr. President, I have offered this amendment. It does not take away from the Federal Government the right or power to exert this authority to prescribe the times, places, and manner, but it limits it to the times when the States themselves shall refuse or neglect to make such regulations.

Mr. President, while it has taken some time to recite all this, the facts are so plain, the record is so complete, the conclusion is so definite and unanswerable, that no Senator will rise in his place and deny that this was the plain, manifest intention and understanding of all the States in the adoption of the Constitution.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] asked me a question which I do not feel that I am at liberty to omit to answer, although it had not been my purpose when I rose to take up the time of the Senate with it. As stated when I began, I had no intention to make any extended remarks at this time. As I understand the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota, it is one which has frequently been made upon this floor as to the Bristow amendment, as we now call it, the Sutherland amendment as it was known in the last Congress, because they are both exactly the same in effect. There is not a word of difference between them. So, if I speak of the Sutherland amendment, it will be known I do it as a matter of habit, as I have reference to the Bristow amendment, the two being identical. That suggestion, so frequently made, is to the effect that that amendment only retains, in case we should adopt the joint resolution providing for a direct election of Senators by vote of the people, the present powers of the Constitution in controlling the election of Senators, and makes no change in them, whereas it is contended that the joint resolution amending the Constitution which is reported from the Committee on the Judiciary does make a change in this particular. That, I understand, is the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. President, I think it is capable of easy demonstration that the adoption of an amendment giving to a direct vote of the people the choice of Senators, leaving at the same time the language of the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution to apply to that changed condition, does make a most radical change in the law, and that there will be a control by the General Government of the election of Senators which the General Government has not now under the present law.

It is true, Mr. President, that the language used in the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution is language which applies both to the election of Senators by the legislatures and to the election of Representatives by the people, but it is manifest that that provision in the Constitution, as it now stands, does give the Federal Government the power of control over the manner of the election of Representatives, which it has not and can not have under the present law in the election of Senators. Why? I have given to-day an enumeration of the several powers which, under the construction now given to that clause of the Constitution, are brought into force and exercise whenever Congress sees fit to exercise the power in prescribing what shall be the manner in which the Members of the House of Representatives shall be elected.

There might be others added to this enumeration, but these are the plain ones that lie upon the surface. I have enumerated the power to appoint registrars. I could have added to that the power to pass a registration law. There is no doubt about the fact that if Congress has the power to appoint registrars to judge of who shall vote under the registration law made by the State, Congress also has the power itself to prescribe who shall be registered, and to appoint men who shall make the registration. Congress has the power to make a registration law. It is true that in the making of that registration law Congress would be limited to the placing upon the registration list those who are qualified to vote under the State law. There is no doubt about that; but there is always a wide discretion, where different qualifications are enumerated, in the registrars as to whom they put upon the list and whom they will take off it. But that is aside.

So far as the elections of Members of the House are concerned, under the power to prescribe the manner in which those elections shall be held, there is the power to pass a registration law to register the votes that shall be received at the polls, to appoint the registrars, the supervisors of elections, judges of elections, and the returning boards to decide the result of the elections; also marshals and deputy marshals at the polls to maintain the authority of these officers, and, if need be, soldiers at the polls to support the marshals in their effort to support and enforce the acts of these officers.

There is no question about the fact that under the construction given to the fourth section such is the power of Congress in prescribing the manner in which Members of the House of Representatives shall be elected. Is there any Senator here who will say that under the present law under which Senators are elected by the legislatures Congress can pass or enforce any law which shall apply to the legislature of a State in managing and controlling the legislature in electing a Senator in the same way and by the same means that Congress can under that clause of the Constitution now exercise in managing and controlling the elections of Representatives? It is impossible under that clause of the Constitution for Congress to undertake to control the elections of Senators through the appointment of registration boards to determine who are the legislators entitled to vote, of judges of the election to supervise the elections by the legislature, with returning boards to determine and certify the result of the election by the legislature, with marshals and deputy marshals present at the session of the legislature, and, if need be, soldiers also to enforce in the legislature the authority and orders of these registrars, judges, and supervisors and returning boards. The mere statement of such a proposition shows its impossibility. Although the language of the Constitution as to prescribing regulations for the control of elections is now the same for Representatives as for Senators, who is there who can rise in his place and say that Congress, without an absolute revolution in the Government, without overturning the autonomy and sovereignty of the States, without an utter destruction of our form of government, can undertake to prescribe registration laws for the legislatures, can undertake to supervise the election of a Senator by a legislature, to invade the halls of a legislature and set up the judges of the election, to put marshals appointed by Federal judges in the legislative halls, to see that the legislature elects Senators right, to send the armed forces of the United States with their guns and their sabers into the halls of the legislature to enforce the law with reference to the election of Senators?

Mr. President, the proposition is an absurdity. This all can now be done by Congress in controlling the manner of electing Representatives. But who will say that this can be done in the election of Senators by the legislature of a State? I am satisfied there is not a Senator here who will not admit that while all this can be done in the election of Representatives, it would be an absurdity to talk about its being done in the election of Senators. Who can doubt it? The language of the Constitution as to the control by Congress of the elections of Senators and of Representatives is the same. The application of it is necessarily different. It is an impossibility that in practical enforcement it can be the same in one case as in the other. The same power under the law as it now exists is nominally conferred by the Constitution on the Federal Government in the election of Senators that is exercised in the election of Representatives, but practically it is impossible under the present law for that power to be exercised by the Federal Government in the election of Senators; but when you change the law so that you put the election of a Senator by the people and upon the same plane as the election of a Representative, and apply the law to him which can not be applied now, the power can be exercised in the election of Senators, and you have made a tremendous change; you have made a revolutionary change. You have made the law in its practical enforcement through the control registrars and supervisors and judges of elections with marshals and if need be soldiers at the polls apply to the election of Senators, a thing that is now impossible. When this change is made, you will have made, Mr. President, that which, in my honest judgment, in time will unsettle the foundations of this Government. You will make practically a new Government when you destroy the power of the States to control the election of their Senators. It may take a long time, but it will come.

Mr. President, what is the highest practical evidence of the fact that the same law, while written on the statute books in he same words and applying to Representatives, does not in practical enforcement apply to Senators? We know that in the past 40 years, in times of great heat, in times of great sectional difference, in times of great political excitement and partisan controversy, there were two election laws put upon the statute books. There was just as much inducement, just as much partisan desire then to control the election of Senators as there then was to control the election of Representatives. The great influences which caused Congress to pass those election laws for the purpose of controlling the election of Representatives were influences equally as potent, equally as active, equally as moving and pushing in the case of Senators as it was in the case of Representatives, and even more important from a partisan standpoint.

The same purpose which there was to control the election so far as it concerned Representatives would have given to Congress the intent to control the elections to the Senate in the same way. Yet examine those laws and what do you find? It was just as important, if not more important, to the influences which brought forth those election laws that they should control the election of Senators as that they should control the election of Representatives. Yet with the greatest inducement to control not only the Representatives but Senators, you will find upon examination of those laws that they applied exclusively to the election of Representatives. There is not a word in either one of them about the election of Senators, but all the machinery providing that in any district, or in any smaller community, a certain number, from 10 to 20, might go before a judge of a district court and make affidavit that a fair election was not going to be held, and then empower the judge of the district court to appoint registrars and supervisors and judges to hold that election, bailiffs of the court to attend those elections to uphold the authority of those registrars and supervisors and judges, and armed men at the polls to uphold the authority of the marshals if they did not have the power, all of it relating exclusively to Representatives, and no line or letter relating to the election of Senators.

Well, also in the force bill, at a more recent date, passed at a time when it was said there was a great need that there should be a law controlling elections in the country, when it passed the House and came to the Senate and was defeated under the methods which I have spoken of, there was not a line nor a syllable nor a letter with reference to the election of Senators. It was recognized that while the language of the Constitution empowering Congress to control elections was applicable alike to the election of Senators and the election of Representatives, it could not be in practice made to apply to the election of Senators.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nor as to the election at the polls where the legislature was elected by which Senators were to be elected.

Mr. BACON. Nor, as suggested to me by my friend from Mississippi, as to the election at the polls where the legislatures were to be elected by whom Senators were to be elected.

Now, Mr. President, is there any escape from the proposition under the law, as it now stands, although in the Constitution the same law is written with reference to Senators that is written as to Representatives, the law is in possible enforcement different from the one as to what it is as to the other; that whereas you may put registrars and supervisors and judges and marshals of the courts, and armies to support marshals and judges of election, and bring testimony as to who has been elected in the case of Representatives, it is under the law as it now exists an absolute, practical impossibility now in the case of Senators so recognized and so acted upon by Congress when it had every inducement to construe it otherwise.

But, Mr. President, when you let that same clause in the Constitution stand as to the control of the election of Senators, and when you provide that the election of Senators shall be by the people, then every regulation of elections which can be put on the statute book which relates to the election of Members of the House of Representatives can be made to apply with equal force instantly practically to the election of Senators. Is that no change? The claim that no change will be made can not be supported. That has been the cry in the last Congress and in this Congress, and that is one ground upon which it is sought to be vindicated, that we are not changing the law; that we are letting the law stand as it is. One can safely challenge the proposition that the law will not be most radically and fundamentally changed; and until some one does answer this argument, let no one again repeat the assertion that the law as to the control of the election of Senators will not, in practical effect, be thus changed.

Mr. President, I did not intend to occupy the time of the Senate with any extended argument this afternoon. I do not know that I should have said a word at this time if my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. STONE] had not insisted that I should explain the amendment which I offered to the Senate. I had purposed to let it go upon its merits. I had said to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that I did not feel that I could properly go on to-day; but, Mr. President, as I have entered upon the subject, and have been unwittingly led into a general discussion, I want to discuss one other feature of the subject.

One of the arguments which has been pressed with great earnestness and with unremitting perseverance has been the one I have attempted to answer this afternoon—that the change in the law submitting the election of Senators to the direct vote of the people, with no supervision other than that which is now contained in the Constitution, would not change in effect the present Constitution as regards the control of those elections by the Government. If I have not demonstrated the fact that it would make a change of a most radical and far-reaching character, then, Mr. President, it is because I have not the command of language in order to express the thoughts which are in my mind and the arguments which have presented themselves to me. One other proposition which has been urged here to-day as a reason why this amendment which comes from the Committee on the Judiciary—which is the same that passed the House of Representatives—should not be adopted and why the amendment now offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] and formerly offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] should be adopted in lieu of it is that, even conceding that there is this change, even conceding that the effect of it will be to change radically the power of Congress over the election of Senators, at least it only gives Congress the same power over the election of Senators which it has over the election of Representatives, and therefore should not be objected to.

I had no intention of going into that, but, with the permission of the Senate, if I do not unduly weary it on this very warm evening, when, of course, I must suffer more from my persistence than they from submitting to it, I want to answer that.

Conceding that the effect will be to change the control of the United States Government now in the election of Senators, and that in that change it only gives the Government of the United States the same power over the election of Senators that it now has over the election of Representatives, why, it is asked, should there be any reason why the Government of the United States should not have the same control over the election of Senators as it has over the election of Representatives? Well, sir, I want to give several reasons. Some of them have been given heretofore, and I shall do no more than touch them, at least those of them that I understand to have been already discussed. There are one or two of them, however, that I do not recollect having heard discussed, which I may speak of a little more at length.

In the first place, as I have endeavored to demonstrate, the power now claimed and which at times has been exercised in the control of the election of Representatives is altogether greater than that contemplated or intended by the framers of the Constitution, and if any change is to be made it should be a change which would take away the power to interfere with the elections of Representatives and not a change to give further power to interfere with the election of Senators.

In the next place, as has been repeatedly said here, and not very long ago said by my learned friend, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], on my left, a Senator occupies a very different relation to the Government in his representation of a State here from what a Representative occupies in his representation of a given number of people. A Senator represents not only the people found within the State, but he represents the corporate entity of the State. He represents more than that, Mr. President; he represents that which the Supreme Court of the United States in more than one decision has recognized, to wit, the sovereignty of a State.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He represents the State regardless of the number of people within the State.

Mr. BACON. He represents the State, as is said by the Senator from Mississippi, regardless of the number of people in that State.

The Supreme Court of the United States has more than once said that within its sphere the State is as much of a sovereign as the United States in its sphere, and the Senator represents here not only the people and all the material interests within a State, but he represents the corporate entity and the sovereignty of the State.

Certainly, Mr. President, there is the strongest of reasons why the State should control the selection of the men who are thus to represent the State in this high Council of States. In the one case the representation is a representation of that which is in its nature national; it is a representation which includes a certain number of people, greater in the aggregate in one State than in another, equal in its representation in the one district as in another, whether in the same State or not. It is a representation of that which is more particularly national. In the other it is the representation of that which is an entity in itself, and which has the same dignity each that another has, regardless of how much greater in area or population the one may be than the other.

But, Mr. President, there is another view of it of a more practical character that I want to suggest to the Senate, and that is that the election of a Senator and his presence in this body and the power which he exercises is a matter of surpassing importance—much greater than the representation of a Representative in the House of Representatives. Sir, I do not in any degree underestimate the dignity and importance of the House of Representatives. To one familiar with the duties and authority of other national representative bodies and who knows the vast scope of the immense interests controlled by the American House of Representatives and the wide range of its activities and powers, there can be no hesitation in saying that it is, as a strictly legislative body and in its legislative capacity, the most powerful and important of all representative bodies of the world.

But the Senate is much more than a legislative body. Aside from the question of numbers, the power which the Senate has in the peculiar functions which are devolved upon Senators makes the office of Senator of far greater importance. But passing from that for a moment and returning to the question of numbers. There is one suggestion in that connection that I wish to make. We hear a great deal about the interests and about the control of the Senate by the so-called interests. I think much of that is exaggerated; in fact, I know it is; but it is possible in the future, as it has been in the past, that it will be greatly to the interest of the interests to control the Senate. The control of one or two Representatives in the other House is a minor matter, because of the great number of men there, aside from the greater difference still of the functions which they perform; but the control of a few men in the Senate is a matter of most vital importance. The control of the election of one man in the Senate may change the practical control of the Government. It may be at some time that there is some Senator who is particularly disagreeable to certain influences. He may be a man who stands not in awe of the powers that be, political, financial, or otherwise. To control such a man as that in the other House would have very little influence upon the destinies of the country or upon the laws which are to be passed or the legislative functions to be performed, but to control the election or return of such a man in the Senate may be a matter of the vastest importance.

Mr. President, the application I make of that is this: One of the greatest evils which are apprehended in regard to the election of Senators by the people is the danger that contests over seats will arise in the Senate which can not be settled practically upon their merits because of the vast number of votes which shall have been cast in any senatorial election, and which will be in consequence decided by the Senate on political grounds, or on some other grounds. Whenever you put it within the power of Congress to pass registration laws and make supervisors and judges of elections, for the purpose of doing that which the minority in their report from the Judiciary Committee assert as one of the purposes of the Bristow amendment, for the purpose of gathering evidence in regard to the election of Senators, it will be an easy matter in the interest of party or of any great influential interest to gather evidence, through these supervisors and judges of election, by which any man may be gotten rid of in this body who may have made himself distasteful or dangerous to some great and powerful influence in this country, political or otherwise. As long as such a man is safe in the confidence of his people, and so long as his State can control the election of its Senators, he is safe from the attack of those without his State—but not so if those without his State through party influence in the Senate can control these elections within the State.

The same thing will be true as to contests between political parties. The minority in their report say that the necessity for Federal control is that the Government may have officers at the polls who should gather evidence and come here and tell us what has been done in an election which entitles one man to a seat and which makes it proper and necessary to turn another man out of his seat. Everybody knows that when it comes to canvassing hundreds of thousands of votes it is an impossibility for the Senate to perform such a task, and with the evidence of these registrars and supervisors and judges and marshals, partisans as they doubtless will be, there will be always enough upon which to base a decision in favor of either man according as the predominant influences, political or otherwise, may desire that one man may be allowed to retain a seat or that he may be turned out and another man may be given it.

Time will not permit that I further elaborate that thought, but there are other reasons why the States should control the question as to how their Senators should be elected.

Mr. President, we frequently hear about the rights reserved to the States, but there is one very remarkable thing that has struck me in regard to the Constitution which we do not hear so often spoken of, and that is, that the purpose of the fathers in forming the Constitution was not only to give to the States certain rights which could not be infringed upon, but they constructed the Government in such a way that the States as States should, in their equal representation in the Senate, be the principal agency, the controlling influence, in everything connected with the exercise of the sovereign powers of the Government; that the States, as States, through their representation in the Senate, should themselves control the most important functions of the Federal Government.

I repeat, sir, that the Senate is much more than a legislative body. It has legislative, executive, and judicial functions. With the House of Representatives it shares the legislative function in the enactment of statutes. With the President it shares the executive functions in the treaty-making power and the appointment of all the officers of the Government. Upon impeachment proceedings by the House, the Senate is empowered to try and upon conviction to dismiss from office any officer of the Government, from the highest to the lowest, and from such judgment and sentence there is no appeal. But this is by no means all.

It may sound like a startling statement, but the Constitution of the United States gives to the States through their representation in the Senate a greater power in the control of the Federal Government than it gives to all the people of the United States combined. It gives to the Senate in the carrying on of the Federal Government a greater power than it gives to any other agency, or any other part of the Government, or of the country, or that which makes up the Government. There are some things denied to the Executive; there are some things denied to the House of Representatives; there are some things which the Senate can do in connection with the Executive; there are some things which the Senate can do in connection with the House of Representatives; but there is nothing that can be done without the Senate. With the House of Representatives it can pass a law with the approval of the President of the United States, and it can pass a law with the disapproval of the President of the United States. It can repeal a law over the objection of the President of the United States. With the President of the United States the Senate can make a treaty, which is the supreme law of the land, against the wish of the House of Representatives. With the House of Representatives the Senate can subsequently, by the enactment of a statute, repeal that treaty against the wish of the President of the United States. The Senate in conjunction with the House can declare and make war against a foreign nation contrary to the wish and over the objection of the President; and then the Senate and the President, acting together in making a treaty, may stop that war and make peace with that country against the wish and over the objection of the House of Representatives. The Senate of the United States, in cooperation with the President, can make any officer of the United States from the Chief Justice down to a marshal of a district, and the Senate of the United States, acting with the House of Representatives, can turn that man out of office without the consent and against the wish of the President of the United States. So I might go on. There are some things which can be done without the House of Representatives and against the wish of the House; there are some things which can be done without the Executive and against the wish of the Executive; there are some things which can be done by the Senate in conjunction with the one over the objection of the other, and vice versa; but there is no single thing which either the House of Representatives can do or the Executive can do without the consent of the Senate. The Senate is the great conservative, central feature of the Government, and the reason of it is this: That the States, each possessing supreme power in itself, were, when the Federal Government was formed, not willing to make the Federal Government unless in the making of it the States should not only have reserved to them the right of controlling their individual and local matters, but also unless the States should have the most prominent and active and controlling part in every function of the Government through their equal and direct representation in the Senate.

Thus it appears, Mr. President, that in this vast machinery of government, while some things can be done without the House, while some things can be done without the President, there is no single function of government of a constructive or of a destructive character, but that at some vital point in the progress of these great and vital governmental measures the Senate must give its assent, and without its assent none of these things can be done. I repeat that that was the great feature in the Constitution adopted not for the purpose simply of forming a well-adjusted Government, but for the purpose of retaining to the States, through their equal representation in the Senate, their power in the control of every active, affirmative function of the Government. The creation and peculiar constitution of the Senate was the great covenant entered into between the States when they framed and adopted the Constitution, and when these great and varied powers were conferred upon those who should represent them in the Senate. What a mockery, what an absolute mockery, to talk about the retention of such power; what an absolute mockery to say that no great function of the Government can be performed unless the States shall consent to it through their Senators, and then pass a law which will say that the States must be overseen in the selection of their Senators; that the States must be controlled; that the States must be supervised and directed when they are to select the men who are to perform this high and mighty function.

Mr. President, my solemn judgment, with the limited opportunity I have had to peruse the political acts of this Government and to look over its legislation, is that there has never been a proposition which strikes so fundamentally at the basic principles upon which the States have entered into the Government as that which seeks to assert the proposition that the General Government shall control the manner in which Senators shall be elected. And, sir, of all bodies in the world that we should be the ones to stand for that proposition! The House of Representatives recognize this. They have in the resolution which they have passed and sent to us grandly stood for the maintenance of the powers of the States.

The House of Representatives sent us a joint resolution, which was a recognition of this right of the States. They sent us a joint resolution in which they say they recognize that the General Government or the people of the other States should not interfere in the local election of Senators; yet it is proposed that we, the special guardians of these mighty functions, we whose duty it is to uphold this ægis of power, we who should magnify our office—that we shall be the ones, over the objection of the House of Representatives, to strike down this power of the States and put it in the power of the General Government, or of a dominant party in the Government—to practically dictate, when political or other influences shall demand it, who shall be declared to be the representative of a State in the Senate. Why, Mr. President, I say, of all men, why should we be the ones to sanction or permit such a thing? It would be bad enough for the House of Representatives to send us a joint resolution such as that now proposed by the substitute of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], which is the same amendment as that offered previously by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]; it would be bad enough if they had sent such a resolution to us, and if they had done so we by right should have refused to concur in it; we should have replied, "In the name of our States, in the name of the great foundation principles of our Government, in the name of those sovereignties who surrendered in part their sovereignty upon the assurance that their right to control their elections should not be destroyed, we reject the proposition." Unless the Senate does consent, the practical exercise of the right to control the election of Senators can not be taken from the States.

Mr. President, I do not know how it may be as to others, but if I should vote for the proposed substitute of the Senator from Kansas, with this right thus to invade the States and control the local election of Senators, and the time should come during the remainder of my life—and who can tell when it shall come—when supervisors and registrars and judges of election and marshals and soldiers at the polls should, after a heated contested election, come here with their partisan evidence, and a man whom the people of my State had legitimately elected should, under the operation of this law, be turned out of the Senate and a man not the representative of my people should be brought here and put in his place, sir, I would call on the rocks and the mountains to fall on me and hide me from the indignation of my people.

It is bad enough when we permit others to rob us of our rights; it is bad enough when we permit others to take from us that which belongs to us; it is bad enough when we let those who do it only by the strong hand tear from our brows the authority and the dignity which belong to us; but it is an unspeakable thing that we should do it ourselves. Why, Mr. President, I am reminded of the fabled eagle, who, when stricken and dying on the plain, found in that dying moment its chief agony when it saw that the shaft which had pierced its vitals had been guided by a feather which had fallen from its own wing. When this amendment has been adopted by the States in the form in which it is now proposed to impose it upon us, it will be an irrevocable act. In my opinion, the great dignity and security and stability of office in the Senate will be gone; in my opinion, the great function of the States that through their representatives in this body should exercise a controlling power that the people themselves do not exercise, and that they should exercise a power that all the other influences put together in the Government do not equal—when, Mr. President, we strike that down, in my opinion we have done that which will unsettle the foundations and destroy the stability of this Government.

For myself—I criticize no Senator who thinks otherwise—I want to warn Senators that I am not alone in this view. In addition to the number of those of us who will vote against the proposed amendment to the Constitution if the Bristow or Sutherland amendment is adopted, as I certainly will, there are other Senators here who take a different view of their duty because of the fact that their legislatures have in times past instructed them to vote for a resolution of this kind, although having no reference whatever to this particular feature of it, they feel that it is their duty to send the joint resolution to those legislatures for their action; but those same Senators are opposed to the amendment to the Constitution with that provision attached to it, and those same Senators will follow it to their legislatures and do all in their power to defeat it. As sure as the substitute is adopted, which will give to the Federal Government power to supervise the election of Senators by the people, to appoint registrars, to appoint judges of elections, to appoint marshals of the district, and soldiers to sustain them—as sure as that is done, there will be a defeat, in my opinion, of this proposed amendment to the Constitution. On the contrary, Mr. President, if the joint resolution is adopted as it comes from the Judiciary Committee, I will support it with the greatest pleasure; I will do all in my power to see that the States ratify and adopt it, and, in my humble judgment, if that is done, the fate of the joint resolution is beyond doubt and the amendment will be adopted by three-fourths of the States of the Union.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, although it is my intention to speak for a short while only, I hesitate to speak at all. I hesitate to speak for two reasons: First, because I dislike by further debate to defer a vote on the question now before the Senate, and, second, because I dislike to say what I have in mind to say for fear it might be regarded by some as having a somewhat too partisan coloring; and Senators know how reluctant I am to indulge in anything of that kind. I would not now speak at all, except I feel that what I intended to say should be said by someone in order to keep straight the truth of history. Every Senator on the Democratic side of this Chamber is heartily in favor of the joint resolution as it came from the Judiciary Committee, and every Senator on this side, with possibly one exception, is opposed to the substitute offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. I have been concerned to know and to determine in my own mind just why this substitute has been offered, and particularly why it has been offered by the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. Senators on that side, with few exceptions, will vote for this substitute. Why? Mr. President, there must be some reason, I think some hidden reason, some cause not appearing on the surface, for injecting this substitute as a disturbing force into the consideration of the resolution the House passed and sent over to us, and which the Senate Judiciary Committee has favorably reported to the Senate. What is that hidden reason, that cause under the surface?

Mr. President, I can not escape the conviction that, as a rule, Senators on the other side of the Chamber are not in favor of the election of Senators by a direct vote of the people. I can not believe that any Senator sincerely favoring the direct election of Senators would support, much less propose, an amendment like this. They would not do so because they must know that the inevitable tendency of this substitute amendment is, and will be, to defeat the final adoption of the joint resolution by the Senate and the House, and even if submitted by Congress will almost certainly lead to its rejection by numerous States which otherwise would support the House resolution. Why should Senators insist on pressing this unnecessary and most offensive amendment unless they hope in that way to secure the defeat of the joint resolution by the Senate or by the House, or, failing in that, then to make the resolution so unacceptable in form as to insure its ultimate rejection by a sufficient number of States to prevent its incorporation into the Constitution?

I do not like to call in question the good faith of Senators, and perhaps that does not lie within my privilege when speaking on this floor; but I can not forget or ignore the fact that this question of the election of Senators by the people has become in large measure a party question, and on that ground I have a right to doubt whether Republican Senators are sincerely for the movement. Am I right in saying this is a party question? I see one or two of my friends on the other side shake their heads; nevertheless I am justified by the facts in saying, as I do say, that it is a party question—the Democratic Party being for it and the Republican Party against it. The Democratic Party, through its national conventions for 10 or 15 years past, has specifically declared in favor of the election of Senators by the direct vote of the people. The Republican Party has never in all its history made such a declaration in any of its national platforms.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Has the Democratic Party ever declared in its national platform for this joint resolution in the form in which we find it to-day, meeting the approval of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. STONE. That is a useless question. The Senator from Michigan is too experienced in public and political affairs to ask whether a national convention, or any kind of convention, in declaring for a general principle has also undertaken to outline the exact form in detail of a legal enactment. The Republican Party has never declared for the policy or the principle in any form.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No, Mr. President; if the Senator from Missouri——

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. STONE. For the present to the Senator from Michigan, if the Senator from Oklahoma will pardon me, as the Senator from Michigan was already on the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator from Missouri will pardon me, while the national platform of the Republican Party may not have declared specifically for this proposition, during my service in Congress I have voted for it twice as a Member of the House of Representatives—as a Member of the Republican House of Representatives—and the Republican House of Representatives have passed it two or three times. And, furthermore, I do not believe the proposition has ever been presented here in such form as to test the good faith of the Republican Party.

Mr. STONE. Well, we propose now to present it in that form, if it has never been done before.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; the Senator from Missouri does not propose to put it in that form. He proposes to encumber it with a race rider. He proposes to encumber it with a proposition never before advanced in the consideration of this question in either House of Congress; and if adopted in that form I have serious doubt about its approval by the legislatures of the various States, including my own State, where we can at least approximate our ideals by a senatorial primary, which will give the people a direct voice in the choice of Senators.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. STONE. I will in a moment.

The Senator from Michigan has delivered a speech which may be satisfactory to his constituency, for I believe the people of Michigan, in common with a majority of the people of most of the States, favor this amendment to the Constitution. He sets himself right, and I am glad he does, for if he should go too far wrong on this subject we might all too soon be deprived of the pleasure of his presence in this body.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Before——

The VICE PRESIDENT. One moment. To whom does the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. STONE. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma, who has been upon the floor for some time.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that not only the Republican Party did not place itself on record in its national platform in favor of the principle of the election of Senators by direct vote, but on the contrary by a vote of nearly 10 to 1 it voted down that proposal when submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin at their last national convention.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Before I yield to my friend, the Senator from Idaho, I wish to say that he and one or two others, and I hope even more than that, of our dear brethren on the other side are sincerely in favor of this reform. No man has been more diligent in pressing this resolution than the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I have not been speaking of individuals, let him understand. I have been speaking of the Republican Party as an organization.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I only rose to correct what, I think, is a mistake on the part of the Senator from Michigan. This joint resolution, in its present form, as reported by the Judiciary Committee, passed the House of Representatives some 10 or 12 years ago without any dissenting vote at all. If I am incorrect in that, the RECORD will correct me. I know it passed; I am not sure as to the vote, but I am quite certain it was passed without a dissenting vote.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator from Missouri will pardon me, I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho whether he is quite sure that it passed a Republican House? My recollection is that it passed a Democratic House and that it was the resolution of Mr. Tucker, of Virginia. That is my recollection of it. I may be in error. I know that I voted for the naked question of the election of Senators by direct vote twice as a Member of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BORAH. I think the Senator is correct in the fact that it was a Democratic House, but I am quite sure there were no Republican votes against it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, the statement I made I reiterate—that no opportunity was given for us to vote squarely upon this proposition when we possessed the requisite majority in the House of Representatives.

Mr. BURTON. One minute. Do I understand doubt to be expressed——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. BURTON. Do I understand that doubt was expressed whether a Republican House passed a provision for a constitutional amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No.

Mr. STONE. They passed it with the help of Democratic votes.

Mr. BURTON. They did not need any Democratic votes.

Mr. STONE. They did need them badly. The Senator from Michigan, in the House, voted for a joint resolution in the very form of the one now before the Senate. I refer to the Tucker resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Not in the form in which it is presented to us to-day. I never voted for it in that form.

Mr. STONE. The Senator says not. He knows better than I.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I never would vote for it in that form, and I do not believe the legislature of the State I have the honor to represent in part would ever approve it in that form. I am going to give them an opportunity to do so, however, if they desire, and the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is defeated.

Mr. STONE. I pass that for the present.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is not adopted, I am going to vote for the joint resolution as it comes from the Committee on the Judiciary and pass the responsibility to the legislature of my State. I feel I will discharge my public duty by so doing.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I do not care to be diverted into a discussion of the record of the Senator from Michigan, or the record of any other Senator or Representative, or anything like that. The Senator from Michigan knows his own record and is abundantly able to take care of it here or any other place. What I say is that this question of the election of Senators by a direct vote of the people has been an important, acute, living issue before the American people for many years. It has been frequently before Congress in one form or another—before both Houses, first one and then the other. The Democratic Party took position upon it more than a decade ago; in fact, began the agitation for it; and in every national convention held during the last 10 years has declared for it in unequivocal terms. But the Republican Party has remained silent, not even having the courage to declare its convictions, except on the one occasion referred to by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], when, in 1908, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], being then a member of the Republican national convention, proposed a resolution in favor of the direct election of Senators, and it was voted down by an overwhelming majority of that convention. That begins to look like your party was not in favor of it.

Mr. REED. It was Congressman COOPER, I will call the Senator's attention.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to his colleague.

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. REED. It was Congressman COOPER who offered the resolution, instead of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. STONE. Well, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] supported it, I am sure, and Mr. COOPER was from his State. Like the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], I was under the impression the resolution was offered by the Senator from Wisconsin; but that is immaterial.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will state to the Senator from Missouri that the proposition before the Republican national convention came in the form of a minority report presented by Representative COOPER, of Wisconsin, and it was voted down by the convention.

Mr. STONE. It is immaterial how it got there. It did get there, and it was voted down by a big majority—nearly 10 to 1.

Now, Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Will the Senator from Missouri permit me?

Mr. STONE. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. REED. I desire to call attention, if it will not interrupt, to this statement made by Mr. Bryan in 1894:

If the people of a State have enough intelligence to elect the representatives in their State legislature, to choose their executive officers, to choose their officials in all departments of State and county, they have intelligence enough to elect United States Senators.

And to a further statement made by Mr. Bryan on January 20, 1894:

We all recognize that there is a reason for the election of United States Senators by direct vote to-day that did not exist at the time the Constitution was adopted. We know that to-day great corporations exist in our States, and that these great corporations—different from what they used to be 100 years ago—are able to compass the election of their tools and their agents through the instrumentality of legislatures, as they could not if Senators were elected directly by the people. We are told that we must not change the Constitution because it is a sacred instrument. He who would make such alterations as changed conditions would necessitate is a better friend to the Constitution and to good government than he who defends faults and is blind to defects.

I desire to call attention, since the Senator has spoken of it, to certain planks in Democratic platforms: First, the plank adopted in 1900:

We favor an amendment to the Federal Constitution providing for the election of United States Senators by the direct vote of the people.

To the platform of 1904:

We favor the election of United States Senators by the direct vote of the people.

To the platform of 1908:

We favor the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people, and regard this reform as the gateway to other national reforms.

That is all I care to call attention to at present.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, my purpose is to show to the Senate and, so far as I can, to show to the people of the country that the Republican Party as a party is not in favor of this reform.

Mr. DIXON rose.

Mr. STONE. I speak now, I say again, of the Republican Party as a whole, as an organization, and not of particular individuals. I am happy to say there are individual exceptions to the general rule. According to the vote taken in the Republican convention two years ago there was about 1 Republican out of every 10 who really favored this amendment to the Constitution, and that is about the proportion here in the Senate now.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROOT in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Missouri, when he is making his indictment of the Republican Party as to its favoring or not favoring this joint resolution, if he recalls the fact that three years ago in the Senate Chamber, when the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] offered his resolution to instruct the Committee on Privileges and Elections to report a resolution amending the Constitution so as to provide for the election of Senators by a direct vote, only 9 Democratic Senators voted for the resolution out of a membership of about 35?

Mr. STONE. Oh, the Senator from Montana is—my friend the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], sitting at my side, says "dodging," but I will not use that term. He is simply grasping at a straw—a floating straw—which will not keep his head above water. It is too small a matter to bring in some vote, which I do not recall, had about instructing some committee to do some particular thing. I know nothing about that. If the Senator can satisfy his conscience and his constituency with that sort of thing, all right. If so, then both his conscience and his constituency are easily satisfied.

Mr. DIXON. No; but I was interested in the Senator's statements, and I remembered that on the first test vote, I think, in the Senate, on a motion of the Senator from Oklahoma, there were 9 Democratic and 11 Republican votes in the affirmative. The rest either voted against it or dodged.

Mr. STONE. I will look up that record, if it should be considered of any importance, which I do not now consider it. A proposal to instruct a committee nearly always involves some collateral complication. I do not recall the instance cited by the Senator from Montana, but it must have been complicated by some collateral consideration. The point I am making, and which I am showing beyond doubt, is that the Republican Party, as a party, is not in favor of the election of Senators by a direct vote of the people. The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], who now occupies the chair, voiced that party sentiment when at the last session he delivered his masterful speech on this floor in opposition to the joint resolution then before the Senate, which was in the very terms of the resolution now before the Senate. The Senator from New York and the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] are the best interpreters of Republican Party sentiment on this question.

Mr. President, how many Republican Senators are really in favor of this measure? Very few. A few voted for it last February, when it had little or no chance of getting the required two-thirds majority, who will change their position now, when with their votes it could be adopted. Three months ago they voted against the Sutherland amendment, which was identical with what is now the Bristow amendment. The Republicans who then voted against the Sutherland amendment were Senators BORAH, BOURNE, BRISTOW, BROWN, CLAPP, CUMMINS, GRONNA, and LA FOLLETTE. At that time, Mr. President, the Democratic representation on this floor was not so great as it is now. Perhaps I have no right to intimate that these distinguished Republicans, or any of them, voted as they did on the Sutherland amendment in the fond belief that the measure would be defeated anyhow. But will they vote the same way now? Will they vote against the Sutherland-Bristow amendment now as they did three months ago? If not, then I want to know what has happened in these three months to change the opinion of these Senators? We must assume, of course, that all these Senators had read the Constitution before they cast their votes last February and were familiar with it; we must assume that they had studied the question then before the Senate, and that they acted deliberately and with full knowledge of what they were doing and what the effect would be; and yet we have the spectacle here to-day of beholding the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] snatching the Sutherland amendment from the hand of its author, waving it aloft as his own conception, and leaping into the arena with a grim determination to stand by it and die for it as his very own; and yet, again, this amendment he now champions is the very thing he denounced and voted against three months ago. I should like to know—I expect the Senator from Kansas to tell us—what he has heard since then, and from whom he heard it, and what he has been told to cause him to change his opinion; and especially do I want to know who told him. It is all very curious; in fact, very mysterious.

Mr. President, we have about 10 more Democrats in the Senate now than we had in February; and if these Republican Senators who voted with us in February would vote with us now, we could defeat this Bristow amendment and pass the joint resolution as it came from the Judiciary Committee, and do it with the confident assurance that a sufficient number of the States of the Union would ratify it to write it into the Constitution. The Senator from Kansas has shown his hand, but I do not at this moment recall whether any other of our recent allies have indicated a purpose to join him in deserting us in this hour when victory is hovering right above the standard of the people. There may be others; we will see. If they do desert us, I can only account for it on the theory that they were not wholly sincere before, and that now when we really have a chance of getting this amendment into the Constitution they turn tail and rally to the support of that which they denounced and opposed three months ago, expecting that ultimately they will in some way defeat the adoption of the amendment. They know as much about every phase of this subject now as they knew then and knew as much then as they know now. Why should they seek now to graft this amendment on the resolution unless it be to insure its ultimate defeat? The Southern States have been among the most ardent advocates of this reform, but the Southern States are, as you know, peculiarly situated. Do these Senators change front now with a view to so formulating the resolution as to make it especially obnoxious to the South and seek in that way to thwart the movement for the direct election of Senators? That may be a fine piece of politics, but it can not, I submit, appeal to men who want to deal fairly with a great public question.

Mr. President, I may be mistaken, but I can not escape the conviction that the friends of this reform are now running up against a game of smart politics here in the Senate. That is what I believe about it. The Republican Party is against the amendment, and, as a rule, I expect Republican Senators to be against it. As to Republican Senators generally I have no criticism to make, but as to those who voted with us in February last, but who intend to vote against us now, I am bound to say that they are performing in a most mysterious and inexplicable way unless it be that they have been, and are, merely playing some supposedly smart game of politics without regard for the right or the wrong of the great issue at stake.

Mr. President, I think that is all I now care to say on the subject of this joint resolution.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have here the report of the proceedings of the Republican national convention of 1908, the only copy I ever saw, and the vote on including in the platform a demand for the election of Senators by the people was—yeas 114 and nays 866, and Kansas is recorded as voting "nay."

Mr. STONE. There can be no doubt that this is essentially a Democratic policy, and that the Republican Party is against it. A few Republicans have been converted, and as is usual with new converts they not only want the best places in the band wagon, but they even want to occupy the driver's seat. I would like to inquire if the Senator from Texas knows whether the amiable and distinguished junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] was in that convention?

Mr. CULBERSON. I have not investigated far enough to determine that question.

INCOME TAX.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, while I am on the floor there is another thing that I want to speak about briefly.

The truth is there is a certain contingent of Senators over there on the other side who, finding that a number of things we Democrats have been strenuously advocating for lo these many years are becoming popular, are rushing in to filch and appropriate them. The election of Senators by the people is one of them, and another is a law—a constitutional amendment, if necessary—authorizing the levying of an income tax. The other day I picked up the Washington Times, one of our entertaining Washington publications, and found among other things what I now read:

"Senator NORRIS BROWN, of Nebraska, father of the income-tax amendment to the Federal Constitution, believes" so and so, and his views are stated in extenso. Ye gods, think of the Senator from Nebraska as the father of the income tax! Why, Mr. President, the Democrats of the United States, through their national conventions, have been declaring for an income tax ever since 1896. It was put into the Democratic platform at Chicago in 1896, and it has been a recognized Democratic policy from that time to this. In 1896 the occasion arose for an expression of opinion on the income tax, because the Supreme Court, in contravention of many previous rulings, had, shortly before the convention met, declared the income-tax law passed about a year before to be unconstitutional. And how did that income-tax provision get into the law? Who put it in? It was put in by a Democratic Congress. It was a Democratic measure, and when the Supreme Court held it to be unconstitutional the Democratic convention, which assembled shortly thereafter, declared the decision to be not only against precedent, but dangerous to national safety, and the convention urged it as a duty on Congress to use all the power the Congress had remaining to fortify and defend the country against the evils that might flow from that decision. Republicans all over this country then denounced the Democratic Party for that declaration, charging that the party was making an assault upon the Supreme Court of the United States. And yet if we compare that convention utterance with other utterances since made by great leaders of the Republican Party it appears so mild as to be almost insipid. But you then denounced it from the Atlantic to the Pacific as a firebrand and as an encouragement to anarchy and disorder. You railed out that we were teaching the people to look with suspicion and distrust upon the judiciary just because we said Congress should, despite the decision of the Supreme Court, use all the constitutional power it had for the enactment of some constitutional law that would authorize the levy of an income tax. But in spite of your denunciations the American Democracy have kept right on demanding an income tax. The last Democratic national convention, held at Denver in 1908, incorporated this plank in its platform:

> We favor an income tax as part of our revenue system, and we urge the submission of a constitutional amendment specifically authorizing Congress to levy and collect a tax upon individual and corporate incomes, to the end that wealth may bear its proportionate share of the burdens of the Federal Government.

That has been the Democratic attitude on this question since it first arose in 1896. It is an old and familiar Democratic doctrine. And yet my good friend from Nebraska—and we are the best of friends—permits himself to be—at least he has not protested against being—exploited in the press in a friendly and partial newspaper as "the father of the income tax," although the Republican Party has never, never, never declared for it in any national convention. That party has been silent upon that question, as it has been silent upon the election of Senators and silent upon other leading questions of the day. In fact the Republican Party has come to be the great party of silence. And yet, accepting the Washington Times as authority, and despite the oft-declared position of the Democratic Party, one might suppose that the income tax was a homeless wanderer, a sort of legislative nullius filius, and that the Senator from Nebraska happening to see the waif, tottering, tattered, and sore footed, took it to his bosom and became its sponsor. [Laughter.] Why, Mr. President, we Democrats have been nursing this child on a bottle of blue milk, so to speak, for lo, these many years. We have had to nurse it in that way because you gentlemen over on that side who have been controlling the fat of the land have denied it any other and better nourishment. Here is another striking instance of political larceny. [Laughter.] You are trying to take something that does not belong to you. Well, take it, if you really want it. We do not care, for the Lord knows you ought to have something good to comfort you. You are welcome to all the comfort you can get out of this, only I want it understood in the wind up that this income-tax proposition was born in our household and nurtured by us until a few Republican Senators came over and helped us to submit it to the legislatures of the States as an amendment to the Federal Constitution.

I have sat here in my seat for months, one Congress after another, and witnessed a select coterie on that side exploit and attempt to appropriate Democratic ideas and policies, and claim them as their discoveries. I repeat what I said the other day, that I look with disfavor and distrust upon this abduction of our children and the forcible taking of them over into an inhospitable land. When I see one of the babies we have been taking care of for many years nabbed and run away with [laughter] and taken over there among you bearded old standpatters, can you wonder that some of us should run after it, as I am doing to-day, in the hope of rescuing it, or at least branding it? [Laughter.] If there be among you any who really care for these Democratic children, then come over here and help us take care of them in the right spirit and in the right way.

NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

One other thing now and I am done, and that one other thing is about New Mexico and Arizona.

Somehow I can not get it out of me that there is some sort of scheme—and a wicked scheme—being concocted in some way to let New Mexico in and keep Arizona out of the Union, because Arizona is Democratic and New Mexico is supposed to be Republican.

Mr. President, the Democratic House of Representatives passed a bill about a month ago admitting both these Territories as States and sent the bill over here. I have personally inquired of members of the Committee on Territories here to-day, and they tell me that there has been no meeting of that committee since that bill was referred to it and laid upon the committee table. Why? What have they been doing? Up to this time this has been, so far as the Senate is concerned, a session of leisure for most Senators. The Committee on Finance has been holding sessions, listening to useless hearings, useless for the most part, and thereby wasting time for political reasons, but the Committee on Territories has had nothing to do during all the weeks of this session.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. STONE. I do, for the Senator is the chairman of the Committee on Territories.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The suggestion of the Senator from Missouri I can not permit to pass unnoticed.

Mr. STONE. It ought not to be permitted to pass unchallenged.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator need not give himself any concern about it. It will not be permitted to pass until he is set right about it, although it is a very difficult task for me to assume.

Mr. STONE. No; it is not. I have great faith in whatever the Senator says.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I thank the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. When he speaks with authority.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will say to the Senator from Missouri, Mr. President, that the meeting day for the Committee on Territories is Friday. A week ago last Friday the House bill was not before the Committee on Territories, and did not reach that committee until Saturday.

Mr. STONE. Last Saturday?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; a week ago last Saturday. That day the leader of the minority on that committee, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], had been called out of the city by the illness of his mother, I believe. Other Senators who are members of that committee have been absent since. I was unavoidably absent last Friday. The committee will be called together on the meeting day this week. Not the slightest disposition is manifest either in the majority or the minority members of that committee not to act promptly and fully upon that legislation.

Mr. STONE. There is no reason for the minority not to act promptly, but every reason why the minority should.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I desire to say further that the Committee on Territories organized, I think, more promptly than most of the other committees which were appointed a few weeks ago. We proceeded almost immediately to consider this very question to which the Senator from Missouri has referred. We have been asked to give hearings to citizens of Arizona and New Mexico upon both sides of the question involved, and this afternoon we have agreed upon a day of meeting to hear those who are interested in this legislation.

I want to say again, in order that there may be no misapprehension whatever in the mind of the Senator from Missouri or of any other Senator, that, so far as I am concerned—and I think I may speak for every member of the Committee on Territories—there is not the slightest disposition to delay or hinder that legislation at all. It will be brought here from the committee to which it has been properly assigned for consideration, and the Senate will be asked to take such action upon it as it may deem best.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have once or twice called upon committees which have House bills pending before them, and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], the leader of the minority, and other Democratic Senators have several times called upon the committees to know when we could expect bills that are before them to be acted upon and reported to the Senate. The chairman of whatever committee it might be has always risen and told us that his committee was proceeding with all due dispatch and expedition, and that they would get the bills in here in due course and as soon as it could be done, but the bills do not come, and they are not here.

Mr. President, you know, and we all know, that we have been adjourning over here from Monday to Thursday and from Thursday to Monday, and for the most part doing nothing.

Why a bill like this New Mexico-Arizona bill should be practically three weeks in the hands of the Committee on Territories, without action by the committee, I do not understand; and, moreover, I do not understand why there is any need for hearings before the committee. The question of the admission of these Territories has been before the other House and before the Senate for a long time. We have had many hearings about it. Who wants to be heard now? Who needs to be heard now? Is there anybody in Arizona or New Mexico opposed to the admission of these Territories, or either of them, as States? If there be, has he not already stated his objections in hearings already had, and are not his objections preserved in the prints of the committee? Are these Territories to be put off again with some vague promise of some wholly unnecessary hearing before this committee at some indefinite time in the future? In the name of Heaven when will Arizona and New Mexico have a hearing before the Senate? Sir, before I sit down—and I am about through—I want to give a reason why delay might be desired and sought by some. Rather than look it up myself, I asked my friend and colleague the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], the other day when we were talking about this matter, to look over the enabling acts and into the facts and advise me as to the situation. We had been reading something in the papers about it, and I asked him to look it up, for I have great confidence in the judgment of my colleague. I have faith in his judgment because he is a lawyer well trained, of wide reading and large experience, and when he speaks he can be depended upon. He looked the matter up and then went over it with me. I understand the situation to be this: The enabling act provides for the admission of New Mexico after the calling of a constitutional convention, the adoption of a State constitution, and the submission of the same to the qualified voters of the Territory. Those are preliminary steps. Then section 4 of the enabling act provides as follows:

A certified copy of the same shall be submitted to the President of the United States and to Congress for approval, together with the statement of the votes cast thereon and upon any provisions thereof which were separately submitted to and voted on by the people; and if Congress and the President approve said constitution and the separate provisions thereof, or if the President approves the same and Congress fails to disapprove the same during the next regular session thereof, then and in that event the President shall certify said facts to the governor of New Mexico, who shall, within 30 days after the receipt of said notification from the President, issue his proclamation, etc.

Section 5 of the enabling act, after providing for the election of a State legislature, Members of Congress, and so forth, provides:

And in case the President of the United States and Congress approve the same—

The constitution—

or in case the President approves the same and Congress fails to act in its next regular session, all as hereinbefore provided, an election shall be held, etc.—

And then the section goes on to provide that after the election has been held the result shall be certified to the President, who shall thereupon—immediately issue his proclamation announcing the result of said election so ascertained, and upon the issuance of said proclamation by the President of the United States the proposed State of New Mexico shall be deemed admitted by Congress into the Union by virtue of this act, etc.

The Arizona enabling act is substantially the same as that of New Mexico.

Now, Mr. President, how does the case stand? New Mexico held a convention and submitted a constitution which was ratified by the voters of the Territory, and has taken all the preliminary steps required by the enabling act. Everything required to be certified to the President and to Congress has been certified. What is true of New Mexico is also exactly true in all particulars of Arizona. Both Territories have done all they are required to do or can do. But here at Washington the two Territories do not stand on the same level. The President has acted upon and approved the constitution of New Mexico, but he has taken no action upon, either approving or disapproving, the constitution of Arizona. Congress has not acted upon the constitution of either Territory. The House of Representatives has passed upon both and approved both, but the Senate has taken no action on either. The approving bill passed by the House of Representatives is now before the Senate committee. That committee ought to have acted upon that bill with promptitude and reported it to the Senate, so that the Senate might have declared its approval or disapproval of the constitutions adopted by these Territories. That has not been done. The Senate has no chance to act. Now, in a few days the Senate will be in the thick of tariff discussions with the reciprocity bill and later with tariff bills on the calendar as the unfinished business, and thus everything else will be put aside until they are disposed of. In all probability that may mean that the bill for the admission of these Territories will fail of consideration at this extraordinary session.

Remember the enabling acts provide that Congress shall pass upon the constitutions adopted by the people of these Territories not later than the next regular session following the certification of the same to the President and to Congress. Remember the act further provides that if the President approves these constitutions, or either of them, and if Congress fails to approve or disapprove—that is, to take action—at the next regular session, then the Territory whose constitution the President has approved shall, upon the proclamation of the President, be admitted as a State into the Union. The President has approved the constitution of New Mexico, but has taken no action on the constitution of Arizona. Now, if our Republican friends over there can by parliamentary manipulation and delay prevent the Senate acting upon this House bill, either at this extraordinary session or at the next regular session beginning in December, then New Mexico can come into the Union on the proclamation of the President and Arizona be left out in the cold.

There are those who desire the admission of New Mexico, but do not want Arizona admitted. Every scheme of delay helps those who wish to accomplish that end. If we fail to pass the resolution approving the constitutions of both Territories at this session, and then again fail to approve them at the next regular session, the President can let in New Mexico and close the door in the face of Arizona.

Mr. President, is this another scheme of smart politics being enacted here under our eyes? It looks like it to me, and I want the people of the United States to understand just what the situation is, and then they can judge for themselves. Your Republican national convention, as well as our Democratic national convention, declared in favor of admitting both of these Territories—not one, but both—and we are bound in honor to keep faith with the people of these Territories and with the people of the United States. We Democrats are here to keep faith. How is it with you? I pray you let there be no political juggling to keep one Territory out and let the other in because of some possible political advantage. Mr. President, I have said this much because I want the great constituencies we represent in this high tribunal to know what is going on with respect to these various matters in the Senate of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to the substitute offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] is in substance the same as the provision which is stricken out of the joint resolution as reported from the committee by the substitute which I offer, except that it provides that Congress may make or alter the regulations of a State—

Whenever the legislature thereof shall neglect or refuse to make such regulations, or from any circumstances be incapable of making the same.

That is, the amendment repeats practically the phraseology of the first paragraph of section 4 of Article I of the Constitution, and then limits its application by saying that the Federal Government may make such regulations whenever the legislature of a State refuses to do so.

If I were required to choose between the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia and the joint resolution reported by the committee, I should prefer that of the committee, because it simply repeals a part of the first paragraph of section 4, Article I, of the Constitution, while the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia repeals that part of the paragraph and then adds another provision, which, in my opinion, would probably deprive the Federal Government of authority which it ought to have. It goes a step further, it seems to me, in the restrictions which it would place on the Federal Government than the joint resolution as reported by the committee, and I can not see how anyone who is opposed to amending section 4 of Article I would prefer the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia to the joint resolution reported by the committee.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. Does not the Senator recognize that the amendment offered by me provides against the contingency which has been commented upon by various Senators, that a State might fail to make proper provision for such election, and in that case there would not be the machinery provided for carrying on the Government? The amendment provides that in case of such failure the Federal Government shall do it. Would there not be an advantage in that proposition?

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator from Georgia wants the Federal Government given authority to compel the election of a Senator or Senators when the State refuses, by going into the State and by some process compelling it to elect, I think that his amendment would give at least the semblance of authority to do that.

Mr. BACON. Oh, no; the Senator misapprehends the amendment altogether. The Senator does not properly conceive its purpose or effect. The purpose sought to be effected is that which was avowed by all of the States, without exception, when they ratified the Constitution—to limit the exercise of the power of the Federal Government to cases where the States failed to exercise the power and to give the Federal Government the authority to exercise that power in all cases where any State should fail to provide the proper machinery. There is no question of compulsion in the amendment. For that reason, I say, the Senator entirely misconceives it and has not his argument based upon the proper predicates at all. He is clear off the track.

Mr. BRISTOW. Of course, I may——

Mr. BACON. I will give the illustration to the Senator if he desires that I should do so. I do not conceive that a case would ever arise, but in the beginning of the Government there was an apprehension as there had been the difficulty, which has been alluded to by some Senator here to-day, under the Articles of Confederation, in having the States pay the proper attention to keeping the Federal Congress supplied with Members. They neglected that duty; they would not provide for the election.

At the time of the formation of the present Government, which grew out of the Government under the Articles of Confederation, there was evidently in the minds of the framers of the Constitution an apprehension growing out of the fact that there had been such failure when the Government existed under the Articles of Confederation, and, therefore, as explained by Mr. Madison, Mr. Jay, and Mr. Hamilton, and as expressed in the various articles adopting the Constitution by the various States from New England down to South Carolina, there was recognition of the propriety of some legislation by Congress providing the machinery of election for these officers in case the States should neglect their duty.

Now, with that premise, the illustration I propose to give to the Senator is this—again saying that I have no idea that there could be now any such realization of the danger which was then apprehended: If we should pass the amendment providing for the election of Senators by direct vote of the people, and if a State should fail to fix a day when there could be an election, or fail to provide any of the machinery of election, under the amendment offered by me it would be competent for Congress to say that in the State of Kansas, for instance, a Senator should be elected on a certain day by general vote of the people, among the qualified electors, those who are qualified to vote for members of the most numerous branch of the legislature, and that the election should be held thus and so and that the returns should be made in such a manner and that the result should be declared in such a manner.

There is the illustration of the function which would be performed by the Government if those circumstances should arise and the amendment I have offered should be adopted. The Senator, of course, will recognize that in that there is no possible element of compulsion which Senators have spoken of as being one of the things which would be resorted to under the amendment offered by me.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not intend to——

Mr. BACON. In order that I may not interrupt the Senator again, I wish to say that, as I understand, the substitute offered by the Senator, now known as the Bristow amendment, is identically the same amendment as that offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] in the last Congress and known as the Sutherland amendment.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will explain that matter in a very few minutes, because I want to present this right if I can.

Mr. BACON. I have not a shadow of a doubt about their being identical, but I should like to have the Senator state it. I am not denying at all that they are.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am not denying at all that they are exactly the same in phrase. Unfortunately the discussion of this amendment to the Constitution, which is, in fact, an amendment of section 3 of Article I, has been almost wholly in regard to the amendment of section 4. This joint resolution was originally introduced by myself, and at my request, as the Senator from Georgia will remember, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It provided, in as simple language as I know how to express it, that section 3 should be amended so as to read as follows:

The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote.

That was the provision of the original resolution which I introduced some two years ago. The only change that is made in the Constitution was to substitute for the words which I now read, "chosen by the legislature thereof," the words "elected by the people thereof." That was the only change which was sought to be made, it simply providing that Senator should be elected in the respective States "by the people thereof," instead of "by the legislatures thereof." The remaining words of section 3 were left just as they were, without any change.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported the joint resolution out, or what has been referred to as the Tucker resolution, I believe, as a substitute, and the only material change between the substitute reported by the Committee on the Judiciary and the joint resolution that I introduced was an amendment by the Committee on the Judiciary to section 4 of Article I. Paragraph 1 of the section now reads as follows: "The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

The committee amended it by providing that in lieu of all of the paragraph, in so far as the same relates to any authority in Congress to make or alter regulations as to the times or manner of holding elections for Senators, the following be proposed: "The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof."

My original amendment did not amend section 4 and did not seek to change that section in any way. The Committee on the Judiciary, in its report, did amend section 4, as stated.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. DAVIS. I want to renew the request of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], and ask the Senator from Kansas if the Bristow amendment as proposed now is not the Sutherland amendment proposed at the last session?

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator from Arkansas will wait just a few minutes, I will come to that part of it.

Mr. DAVIS. I want an answer to that question, and then I have another one.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas has the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator from Kansas declines to answer——

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator from Arkansas will permit me to proceed, I will answer his question.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator from Kansas declines to yield——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas has the floor, and is answering the question of the Senator from Arkansas in his own way, so he states. The Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas has the floor.

Mr. BRISTOW. After the Committee on the Judiciary had reported this amendment in the form that I have referred to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] offered an amendment to the report of the committee striking out that part of the resolution as reported by the committee which sought to amend section 4, leaving the resolution, in substance, the same as I introduced it, not identical in form and language, but in substance the same. That amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] was adopted by the Senate, and the Senate then voted upon the joint resolution as amended by the Senator from Utah, and it lacked, as I remember, three or four votes of a sufficient number to carry it.

When this Congress met I went over the membership of the Senate as it is now composed and ascertained that 10 of the Senators who had voted against the joint resolution when the roll was called on February 26 were not now Members of the Senate, and from inquiry I was convinced that more than a sufficient number of the 10 new Senators would have voted for the joint resolution if they had then been Members of the Senate to have carried it.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BRISTOW. I will yield for any question that is to the point.

Mr. DAVIS. Assuming that the Bristow amendment as now proposed is the same as that offered by the Senator from Utah at the last session of Congress, I want to ask the Senator from Kansas why he has changed his mind on that question?

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will wait he will find out exactly why I am taking the position I am, and I shall have no hesitation in presenting my views upon any question which is appropriate to this case.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield further to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not care to yield any further.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas declines to further yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. I was convinced that if the Senate had been composed on the 26th day of February of the same membership which it now has the joint resolution would have been adopted instead of having been rejected.

Being exceedingly anxious that the Constitution should be amended in this respect, I believed when I introduced this joint resolution on the first day of the session, which is Senate joint resolution No. 1, that if we could get a vote on the joint resolution as it was voted on at the previous session it would be adopted, and that the States would ratify it, and the Constitution would be so amended. I believed then, and I believe now, that it can get more votes in this body in that form than in any other form in which it can be presented. I believed then, and I believe now, that it will command more support before the people of the United States in the form we voted on it and in the form in which I introduced it on the first day of the session than it will in any other form; and being convinced of that, I preferred to present it to the Senate in that way.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to make an inquiry of him?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I want to know if I correctly understand the Senator. I understand this to be the effect of what he says: That the joint resolution in a shape where the Federal Government will have the power to interfere in a State in the making of registration laws and in the appointment of registrars and in the appointment of supervisors of election and in the appointment of judges of the election, and in the appointment of marshals to carry out the authority of these officials and in the calling on the troops, if necessary, to support the marshals—I understand from the Senator that he believes that an amendment to the Constitution which shall give that power to the General Government will command more strength because of that fact than if the amendment did not give it that power. Am I correct in that?

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Georgia is wrong in every statement he has made, from my point of view.

Mr. BACON. I will be more than glad to have the Senator correct me.

Mr. BRISTOW. In the first place, the amendment which I have offered does not add to or take away any power that the Federal Government has now or will have in the future.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator from Kansas deny the constitutional power of the Federal Government, if it sees proper to enact such laws, to control the election of Representatives in the particulars I have mentioned?

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator from Georgia has devoted a great deal of time to and has demonstrated——

Mr. BACON. I think the Senator from Kansas might answer that question.

Mr. BRISTOW (continuing). Very great learning in the discussion of the Constitution of the United States, and what the fathers meant and what they did not mean. Now it is not my purpose to disturb section 4 in any way.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will pardon me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield further to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. BACON. I am not now talking about what the fathers understood or what they proposed to accomplish. I am talking about what the Supreme Court of the United States has determined to be the power of Congress in regard to the election of Representatives, so far as the authority of Congress to legislate is concerned.

Now, I say that the various things which I have suggested have been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States as within the power of Congress in the making of laws to control the election of Representatives.

I understand the Senator now to mean, conceding that there is that power—and I do not think there is any question about it—in the Congress of the United States to legislate with reference to the election of Representatives, and that there would be the same power as to Senators if the clause as it now exists in the Constitution was made applicable to Senators—I understand the Senator to mean, conceding that—and there is no escape from it, so far as I can see, and there is a direct reply to it—that in his opinion the right to exercise that power——

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will please state his opinions and not mine, I will appreciate it.

Mr. BACON. With the permission of the Senator, and without any disposition to intrude upon him unduly, the Senator had stated a proposition, and I am trying to find out if I understand him correctly. I am not saying what he said. I am asking the Senator.

The Senator said that he became satisfied that the amendment in the form which would give this power to Congress was stronger by reason of the fact that that power was given; and in order that I might correctly understand what the Senator meant, I put his proposition in a little different language.

Mr. BRISTOW. I can not permit the Senator from Georgia to make statements I have not made and attribute them to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas has the floor; and does he decline to yield further?

Mr. BACON. Of course, I will not intrude on him.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator from Georgia will be patient, I think I will relieve his mind.

The joint resolution which I introduced some two years ago and the joint resolution which I offer now as a substitute for the one reported by the committee do not seek to confer any new powers or take away any that the Federal Government now has to supervise the election of Senators or Representatives. I do not seek to change in any way the authority of the Government. What authority it may have now or may not have is a question that I do not propose to discuss. I propose to leave that authority just as it is.

The joint resolution which I am supporting here does not change section 4. It does not add to the Federal Government any authority which it does not now have, and it does not take away from it any authority. It leaves the Constitution, so far as Federal authority over elections goes, just as it is now. It does seek to change the method of electing Senators by a simple amendment incorporating into section 3 five words in lieu of the language there now; namely, to strike out "chosen by the legislature thereof," and to substitute "elected by the people thereof."

It does not in any way give the Federal Government any authority to appoint marshals or enact registration laws, or any means of controlling elections that it does not now have, nor does it seek to take away any of its authority. If it is desirable to amend the Constitution so as to restrict the authority of the Federal Government over the election of Senators and Representatives, that is a question for the consideration of Congress and the country. It is to be regretted, at least by those of us who are very earnestly in favor of the direct election of Senators, that this controversy, which is entirely foreign to the proposition I introduced originally or that is presented by me now, should have been injected into the consideration of this question. As to whether or not a limitation should be placed on the authority of the Federal Government is a question that has no place whatever in this discussion.

Now, it is declared here, and I regret it, that unless we consent to an amendment to section 4 taking from the Federal Government the authority which it now has, this amendment for the election of Senators by a direct vote will be defeated by the States, and it has been declared on the floor that Senators who would even vote for the proposition now would go to their States and undertake to defeat it because section 4 is not amended as well as section 3.

Now, I do not believe that Senators, upon deliberation, will take that position. I voted against the Sutherland amendment in the last session of Congress because I was advised by the Senator in charge of the joint resolution and by other Senators in whose judgment I had confidence that it would be stronger with that amendment defeated than with that amendment adopted.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. REED. To get it clearly on the record, was not the Sutherland amendment identical, or substantially identical, with the Bristow amendment?

Mr. BRISTOW. The Sutherland amendment sought to strike out certain provisions in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will wait, I will answer the question. The Bristow amendment, as he calls it, is offered as a substitute for the present resolution. It is as it was voted on by the Senate at the last session in exact terms. It substitutes the resolution which we voted upon at the last session after it was amended for the resolution which the Committee on the Judiciary has reported.

Mr. REED. I am afraid, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas further yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I am afraid that that statement might not be sufficiently concrete to be understood by the people of either Kansas or Missouri. I want to ask again if the Sutherland amendment did not leave the resolution in the identical words, or substantially the identical words, of the Senator's present resolution?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly; and I have stated twice this afternoon that I offered it as a substitute for the present resolution because it is in the exact form that it was voted on upon the 26th of last February. I believed when I introduced it, and I believe now, that there is a sufficient number of Senators in favor of the proposition in that form to carry it, while I have grave doubts whether it would be carried if presented in another form. My purpose is, if I can, to have this resolution providing for the direct election of Senators adopted.

Mr. REED. Did the Senator think at the last session when he voted against the Sutherland resolution that if the Sutherland resolution was defeated the proposition would be stronger in the Senate?

Mr. BRISTOW. I believed at the time I voted against the Sutherland amendment that the resolution would be stronger if that amendment was defeated. I think now that I was mistaken; that it was stronger with the Sutherland amendment incorporated in it than it would have been if not so amended, and it received more votes than it would otherwise have received.

Mr. REED. May I interrupt the Senator for one more question?

Mr. BRISTOW. I believe, further, it is stronger before the people now, in that form, than it would otherwise have been. I can not understand why those who are in favor of the amendment to the Constitution, as I believe some to be who are advocating the resolution as reported by the committee, want the controversies that have been had in this Chamber on this resolution carried to every State in the Union.

I certainly feel that the southern question and the negro question and the State rights question have been discussed enough in American politics. This amendment of mine seeks to change the Constitution so that the people in the States will elect their Senators by a direct vote. It does not in any way seek to change or modify the authority which the Federal Government now has as to the supervision of elections, but it is proposed by this resolution, as reported by the committee, to change the authority that now exists. This change will surely inject into the campaign the question of State rights and all the old dead issues that I thought had been buried for a generation, and which, I say, ought to remain buried.

Mr. REED. The Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield further?

Mr. BRISTOW. I will yield in a moment. Let me ask what benefit the American people are going to derive from fighting in every State in the Union the old controversies that grew out of the Civil War? Let section 4 remain as it is and provide that the people may by direct vote elect their Senators. Now I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I simply wanted information. The Senator said a few moments ago that he believed the resolution with the Sutherland amendment, defeated at the last session, would be stronger. He believes now that with the same amendment to it carried it would be stronger. Does the Senator mean in each instance stronger in this body or does he mean stronger before the legislatures of the various States?

Mr. BRISTOW. Both.

Mr. REED. I want to say to the Senator, if he has any doubt about passing this resolution without the Sutherland amendment, that if he will give us the insurgent vote on the other side of this Chamber there are enough Democrats to pass it.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator is under the impression that a majority can pass the resolution.

Mr. REED. No; two-thirds.

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, the Senator's mathematics are badly wrong.

Mr. REED. Perhaps I overcounted the insurgents. I think we do overcount them occasionally.

Mr. BRISTOW. There has been a very wide range of discussion here. I have been at a loss to understand the purpose of it. I have in a measure concluded that there are two elements at work in this controversy. First, there are influences and individuals who are opposed to the election of Senators by direct vote who want to defeat the proposition, and they realize that they can not defeat that proposition by presenting the plain and simple question to the legislatures of the States. I have no doubt but that the States of the Union, if the plain and simple proposition was presented to them as to whether Senators shall be elected by the legislatures or elected by direct vote of the people, would decide, more than three-fourths of them, in favor of electing by direct vote.

There are some powerful influences throughout the United States which are opposed to this change in the system of electing Senators, and those influences seek an opportunity here to develop political strife, both in the South and in the North, by injecting into this controversy a question that ought to be foreign to it.

If the substitute which I have offered is adopted, the campaign against the change in the method of electing Senators will be carried on in the South by arousing race prejudice and insisting that section 4 should have been changed also.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BACON. I will not interrupt the Senator, if he objects I sat down before when he objected.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not object to a question.

Mr. BACON. I will wait until the Senator gets through, if he prefers it.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am perfectly willing to hear any question that may arise in the Senator's mind.

Mr. BACON. I would not allude to it, except that the Senator himself has alluded to it. The Senator has spoken about race prejudices and appeals to race prejudices and the conflict which arises out of them. He has also given the Senate the reasons why he has changed. Now, I want to ask the Senator if it is not within his knowledge that not in the South, but in some Northern States, there has been raised the race issue upon this particular question?

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will permit me, I will cover that field. I was getting to it.

Mr. BACON. Very well; I will wait.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will cover it.

Mr. BACON. When the Senator has stated it I possibly may have to ask him some other question.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will be very glad to hear the Senator.

As I was saying when the Senator from Georgia rose, if the substitute which I have offered is accepted the influences which are opposed to the direct election of Senators will make a campaign against the adoption of the amendment through the Southern States, discussing not the merits of the proposition but a question foreign to it in order to arouse prejudices that unfortunately exist there. If the resolution as reported by the committee is adopted and the substitute I have offered is defeated, then the opposition to this change in the Constitution will be transferred from the South to the North, and a campaign against it will be made in every Northern State because it changes section 4, and takes from the Federal Government powers which it now has to supervise elections.

Mr. BACON. I presume the Senator means because it does not keep the election of Senators in the control of the Federal Government.

Mr. BRISTOW. Because it changes section 4. I make the statement now with all the emphasis I can that my substitute does not in any way affect, directly or indirectly, the authority of the Federal Government over the election of Senators anywhere. It simply changes the method of electing them. It makes them elected by the people instead of by the legislature. I might say here, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. BACON. I will not interrupt the Senator if he does not wish it.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will gladly yield to the Senator in a few moments. I desire to say that the change in section 4, which the Committee on the Judiciary proposes, apparently does change the authority of the Federal Government. A great many very earnest and intelligent and learned students of the Constitution believe that it changes it in a vital way.

I do not presume to pass upon these profound constitutional questions, not being a constitutional lawyer, but I want to let it alone, and for one I do not want, though the party to which I belong might profit some by it, to precipitate in every Northern State the old political controversies that existed more than a quarter of a century ago, and I can not understand why other Senators should want to do that.

During the last session I made the statement on the floor that I did not think the amendments made to my resolution by the Committee on the Judiciary were material as far as their actual practical effect on the powers of the United States Government was concerned, that I would vote for it either way, and I propose to vote for it either way now; but when I see that the enemies of popular election of United States Senators intend to make a desperate effort to defeat that proposition in the South if one amendment is adopted, and in the North if another amendment is adopted, then I want to appeal to the Senate to keep that controversy out of this question and let us go to the people with the naked proposition as to whether or not the election of Senators shall be transferred from the legislature to the people. I will be glad to yield to the Senator if he has any other question to ask.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. BACON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas yield, and to whom?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg pardon.

Mr. BRISTOW. I yield to either Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought the Senator from Kansas had taken his seat.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator now. I will say to him very frankly that the questions which I am going to ask him are not limited, and he might prefer that I should wait until he gets through. I will do whichever he prefers, because I have a good deal of ground to cover in the matters I propose to submit to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will pardon me, then, I will close in a very few minutes, and if the Senator in his remarks, which he says will be more or less extended, makes any statement I think I ought to answer I will do so.

Mr. BACON. There are things about which I am going to speak which are directly in response to the suggestion made by the Senator. I want to ask him some questions as to matters within his personal knowledge. That is what I am going to ask him about, but I will wait until he gets through.

Mr. BRISTOW. All right. Now, I have discussed and undertaken to present the methods that are being pursued and will be pursued by those who are opposed to the popular election of Senators. The enemies of the direct election of Senators—and I want to prevent it—want some question injected into the campaign other than the simple question of the direct election of Senators, and the adoption of the committee resolution would accomplish that purpose.

There are other Senators and citizens who are honestly in favor of the election of Senators by direct vote, but who fear that the change of section 3 gives to the Federal Government authority over the election of United States Senators it does not now have, and therefore they do not want to expand the power and authority of the Federal Government. In my humble judgment the changing of section 3 does not give to the Federal Government any authority which it does not now possess.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas will allow me——

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. The Senate has now been in session for more than six hours. There is to be a good deal more debate on this question. It is quite obvious that we can not reach a vote without sitting here late in the evening, and I suggest that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BORAH. I want to say before that suggestion is acted upon that it will greatly disaccommodate some Senators if a recess is taken until to-morrow. I should be very glad, personally, to yield to the suggestion, but there are Senators here who are almost compelled to be away to-morrow and they desire to vote upon this measure. Personally, I do not want a vote taken upon the question of a recess until the Senate understands the situation with reference to some of the Senators, because I have assured them that as far as I am concerned I would not ask for a recess under the conditions which confront us.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I join with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] in suggesting that there are some Senators at least who would be glad to have this vote taken to-night. Perhaps it might be arranged to take a recess until half past 8 o'clock and finish the consideration of the joint resolution by midnight.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, of course I am uninformed as to the number of Senators who desire to be heard, but it seems to me we might run along awhile longer now and then take a short recess. There are three or four Senators on this side of the Chamber who are expecting to leave the city, and it will result in very great inconvenience to have their plans changed by the unexpected prolongation of this debate. It seems to me that we can well afford to finish this matter to-night. We might take a short recess for dinner, then resume the discussion of the joint resolution, and vote on it to-night.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it is a matter of indifference to me personally. I doubt very much from what I have been told whether we can get a vote to-night. I understand there are a number of speeches to be made and that the debate will occupy the whole evening, and more, too.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I think it would add to the comfort of some Senators, even though we had to sit here until 12 o'clock, to finish the joint resolution or continue the discussion of it until we get to a vote. I do not see any objection to a short recess for dinner, if that is the desire, but I would rather see the session continue right along until we vote, and take no recess for dinner or anything else.

Mr. LODGE. I have no desire to press the matter, if Senators desire to stay and discuss the joint resolution. I withdraw the motion for a recess which I made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion for a recess is withdrawn. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] has the floor.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, as I was saying before the interruption, there are those who feel, or who have been made to believe, I will say, that the change of section 3, of Article I, does indirectly confer on the Federal Government a power that it does not now have. They justify that conclusion for the following reasons: That Congress now has authority over the election of Representatives that it has not over the election of Senators, because Senators are elected by the legislature; that the legislature is a creature of the State, and the Federal Government could not go beyond the legislative vote; it could not go back and take into consideration the methods by which the legislatures themselves had been elected.

In my humble opinion, the Federal Government, if it has any authority to call in question the manner in which a legislature proceeds to elect a Senator, if the result of the legislative action which might imperil the welfare of the Government was affected by anything that occurred in the election of the members of that legislature the Congress could go back and inquire into that matter. I do not believe the change proposed in section 4 has any relation whatever to the direct election of United States Senators; and it should not have. I am appealing to the Senate to keep that question out of this campaign that we are making in favor of this great political reform.

Now, I want to read the provision in section 4, which is under consideration:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives—shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

It is proposed by this amendment to section 4 to strike that provision from the Constitution in so far as it relates to the elections of Senators, and to take away that authority which Congress has over the election of Senators, and which it has had since the Government was founded. I do not think that we ought in this amendment to take away any of the powers which the Federal Government now has. If those powers are to be limited, let that proposition stand on its own merits, and do not couple it with the other. The only possible effect it can have is to precipitate the discussion in all the States as to whether section 4 ought to be amended; and the controversy everywhere will be over the change in section 4, which deprives the Federal Government of a power which it always has had, and not over the changes in section 3, which only changes the methods of electing Senators.

I want to appeal to every friend of the measure to stand by the original resolution as it was introduced, which is practically the substitute which I have offered, and to refuse to let this great issue be clouded and prejudiced by injecting into the fight an entirely foreign subject. I repeat again, the amendment as I present it is as it was voted on on the 26th day of February last, after it had been amended on the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], it being in terms exactly as the joint resolution was when the roll was called and we voted on it. If left in that form, it will, in my opinion, pass this body and become a part of the Constitution; otherwise, I fear it will fail.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I formed a very unhappy alliance a few days ago on the Lorimer resolution. I thought that the so-called insurgents in this body were in earnest; I thought that they were honest in their public expression that they wanted to reform these things. I joined with them reluctantly, Mr. President, because I am not given to going with that crowd; but when I see the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], who represents an agricultural State, who represents a community of farmers, change front in this body and to-day recommend and insist that the Sutherland amendment of last session shall be passed now in connection with the joint resolution to elect Senators by direct vote of the people, I am amazed. I do not know whether the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] agrees with the Senator from Kansas or not; I do not know whether the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] agrees with him or not; I do not know whether the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] agrees with him or not; but I am amazed to see this crowd change front. They are not sincere, Mr. President, on any proposition that they have taken before the country.

I heard the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], in a six-hour speech—and I listened to it with great care—on the railroad-rate legislation at the last regular session, state that he would not vote for the bill if it were not amended as he suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will admonish the Senator from Arkansas that the rule does not permit him to call in question the sincerity of Senators.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I have been called down so much that it does not hurt me. I am used to it. Just call me down at any time. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a mere admonition.

Mr. DAVIS. But I say I heard—how can I express it [laughter]—the senior Senator from Iowa in a very extended speech declare on this floor that he would not vote for that bill if it were not changed; but he did vote for it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator fom Iowa?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not desire to interrupt the Senator from Arkansas particularly——

Mr. DAVIS. It is no interruption at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. But what he has just stated is not true.

Mr. DAVIS. The RECORD, Mr. President, will speak for itself. The so-called "insurgents" of this body are pretending to the country to-day that they are in favor of reform. They are not in favor of it. They are in favor of "cussing" everybody and objecting to everything that does not suit them, and they want just a little political party to themselves. I am sorry that I got in with that crowd on the Lorimer resolution. [Laughter.]

How will the Senator from Idaho, and the Senator from Iowa, and the Senator from Minnesota, and the Senator from Wisconsin vote on the substitute amendment? It is the same thing as the Sutherland amendment offered at the last session. How are they going to vote? Are they going to vote to tack this amendment on? Why? Because if they do vote for it they know that it will fail to receive the indorsement of the people of the South.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]—if I do not misquote him—said that the "interests" are interested in getting up this controversy and that they have thrown this apple of discord into this discussion. Mr. President, I can not understand why the Senator from Kansas changes his mind and absolutely turns a somersault.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is only under great provocation that I would pay any attention at all to what the Senator from Arkansas says; but the Senator from Kansas believes it is due to him to say that he has not changed his mind; he has not changed his attitude in any way whatever. The resolution which I introduced as a substitute for the report of the committee is practically the same as that I introduced two years ago from which and out of which the joint resolution reported by the committee grew. I hold the same opinion now that I have always held; and my attitude is the same. I voted against the Sutherland amendment, as I have explained, because I thought it would help the purpose, which was to change the Constitution. I believe at this time that the amendment which I have offered is stronger, because it cuts out of the controversy the very question that has been injected into it by the men who ought to be the first to want to keep it out.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I am surprised at the Senator from Kansas when he says that ordinarily he would pay no attention to what the Senator from Arkansas says. That is quite in line with the humor that he is usually capable of injecting into the RECORD. Upon what meat has this our great Cæsar fed that he has grown so great? The Senator from Kansas can not get away from the proposition that the Sutherland amendment of the last session is his amendment now. Then, I ask, Mr. President, why this change of mind? His explanation to the country will not suffice. Why this change of heart? What has come about? The Senator from Kansas says the "interests"—and I do not know what he means by that—are interested in having this matter so beclouded that the Southern States will not indorse it. The Senator from Kansas certainly has turned a somersault in a nighttime. He has seen a light somewhere. He has been instructed from some place; I do not know where. But, Mr. President, I want to say that when he goes back to Kansas, when he goes back to his people, I doubt if they will indorse the resolution which he has asked to be adopted to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to the substitute offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I had supposed that the debate would occupy more time than it has, and I know a number of Senators have left under that impression. I do not think it would be proper to proceed with a vote just at this moment, and, unless some Senator wishes to occupy the floor, I think it would be well to take a recess, say for an hour, or I will suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bacon	Cummins	La Follette	Rayner
Bailey	Curtis	Lippitt	Reed
Bankhead	Davis	Lodge	Richardson
Borah	Dillingham	Lorimer	Root
Bourne	Dixon	McCumber	Simmons
Bradley	du Pont	Martin, Va.	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Mich.
Briggs	Foster	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Bristow	Gallinger	Newlands	Stephenson
Brown	Gamble	O'Gorman	Stone
Bryan	Gore	Oliver	Sutherland
Burnham	Gronna	Overman	Swanson
Burton	Guggenheim	Owen	Taylor
Chamberlain	Heyburn	Page	Terrell
Chilton	Hitchcock	Paynter	Townsend
Clapp	Johnson, Me.	Penrose	Warren
Clark, Wyo.	Johnston, Ala.	Percy	Watson
Crane	Jones	Perkins	Wetmore
Crawford	Kenyon	Poindexter	Williams
Cullom	Kern	Pomerene	Works

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Georgia to the substitute offered by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desired to ask the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] a question or two, and as I thought it better that I should present it at a time when he was not occupying the floor, I postponed it until now.

The contention has been very strongly urged in the Senate, and it has been influential with a great many of my colleagues on this side of the Chamber, that this was practically a moot question, and that the power which it is sought to retain in the General Government, or to confer upon it in a measure being the exercise practically of a new power, is one which it would never be called upon to exercise; that the passions of the past have been stilled; that the temper of the past has been cooled; and that there is no danger that the power will ever be invoked which would be given to the Federal Government to supervise the election of Senators in a direct vote by the people. That, I say, has been very influential in the control of the action of some Senators who utterly disapprove of the Sutherland amendment or the Bristow amendment, as it is now called; and it is not important which you call it, they are the same thing; everybody knows that. It has been influential with Senators who disapprove of that amendment but who will still vote for the joint resolution if the Sutherland amendment or the Bristow amendment prevails. Some few Senators on this side have expressed themselves in the strongest terms as opposed to the amendment, the Sutherland amendment or the Bristow amendment, and they have announced at the same time that even if it is adopted they will vote for the constitutional amendment, proceeding upon the ground that it is practically a moot question and that these powers will never be called into exercise.

Now, we have the statement made by the author of the present amendment that it is so important, that it is regarded as so important by a large part of this country, and by so large a number of States, that in his judgment if it were not adopted and if the joint resolution amending the Constitution were adopted as it comes from the Judiciary Committee, it would invoke a storm of controversy throughout the Northern States and would result in the defeat of the constitutional amendment.

Now, Mr. President, what does that mean? In saying "the Northern States" I speak generally, of course, not including all of the Northern States, for I do not believe all of them think and feel that way; but the Senator from Kansas spoke of the Northern States, and, therefore, in replying to him, I speak of them generally. Does it mean that the people of the Northern States, or such of them as the Senator contemplates, are so intent upon the right to exercise this control of the election of Senators by the people in the Southern States that if they can not have that control they will defeat the joint resolution?

Mr. President, is that a moot question with them? Are they taking that position as a matter of sentiment or is it because of the fact that they recognize that the time may arrive when the Federal Government should intervene in the election of Senators by the people, and should have the power to appoint registrars and supervisors of election and judges of election and marshals at the polls, and place troops at the polls for the purpose of controlling the election of Senators? Is it true that to such an extent are they of that opinion that, unless it can be done, they would oppose the adoption of the joint resolution for the election of Senators by the people?

Mr. President, do people contend with earnestness for the retention of a power that they never expect to exercise? Is it not because they do expect to exercise it? They have exercised it in the past so far as Representatives are concerned, and in thus insisting upon the power they must intend and expect to exercise it in the election of Senators in the future. If they did not they would not contend for it and insist upon it and prepare themselves, as the Senator from Kansas says, for a storm of contention throughout the North that the power may be retained.

The Senator says he has become satisfied that it is stronger that way than it is the other way. What does that mean? It means, Mr. President, that those who insist upon the exercise of this power in the control of the elections in the States are more in earnest, more insistent, more determined than those who deny the right and the propriety of the General Government to interfere and control the elections in the States. What else can it mean than that in the opinion of the Senator from Kansas those who oppose the exercise of this power by the General Government are not as much in earnest as those who insist upon the exercise of that power?

Mr. President, as an illustration of the temper of those who insist on the exercise of that power, I desire to ask the Senator from Kansas some questions.

The Senator from Kansas himself introduced the subject. I think I can appeal to those who heard what I had to say that I said nothing about race contention. I did not use the word "negro." I said nothing about election laws in the Southern States. I tried to debate it and discuss it upon a higher plane, although, of course, we recognize the fact that those questions will come in.

As the Senator from Kansas has alluded to that, I want to ask the Senator a question. The Senator has given us the reasons why he has changed in this Congress from the position he occupied in regard to this matter in a former Congress when he voted against the Sutherland amendment; and I am emboldened to ask the Senator some questions in regard to the change because he has rather complained of those who anticipate that that question will be hereafter raised in the South. The Senator speaks of the Southern States. He speaks of the controversy that is to arise in the Southern States. He says there is to be a storm of controversy there over this question; and I wanted to ask the question of the Senator from Kansas if he does not know personally that the question has already been raised in some of the Northern States, and if he does not know personally that the racial issue has already been introduced in some Northern States as to the votes of Senators who voted against the Sutherland amendment, and that some pressure has been brought to bear on Senators on this floor who voted against the Sutherland amendment, threatening them with that vote in the future if they do not now support and sustain this amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas which is identical with the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]?

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator from Georgia listened to what I said, he will remember that I stated that if the amendment I offered was adopted the fight would be made in the South, but that if it was defeated, it would be made in the North by men who do not want the Constitution changed. They want Senators elected by the legislatures as they are now. The fight will be made because the amendment changes Article IV and not because of the change it makes in Article III, because they think that it will be a more successful way to arouse antagonisms to the submitted proposition.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, it is fortunate that I undertook to propound this question in my own time, from the fact that the Senator, failing to reply to my interrogatory and stating something which is not any reply to it, if I were speaking in his time, would put me in the disagreeable position of unduly occupying his time when I continued to press the inquiry. But I am now in my own time, and I propose to have the Senator come to the point.

It is not a question as to what the effect of it will be in the future. I asked the Senator this question—if he does not know the fact that already, since the vote upon the Sutherland amendment, through racial influences, the issue had been made in States and pressure brought to bear upon Senators who voted against the Sutherland amendment, to make them now vote for the Bristow or Sutherland amendment—whichever you choose to call it—and that that pressure has been brought directly to bear upon Senators for the purpose of influencing their action? Does not the Senator from Kansas personally know that fact?

Mr. BRISTOW. I am perfectly willing to answer the question as directly as I know how. Of course the influences are at work exactly as I stated they would be. The citizens of the various States who are honestly in favor of the direct election of Senators have appealed to Senators and Members of Congress not to change section 4 so as to inject another controversy into it, but to change only section 3.

I can not see but that I have answered time and again the questions of the Senator from Georgia—that the opposition is in the North; that it will be made in the North. The fight will be made throughout the North against this proposition because it changes section 4, and I want to cut out the change in section 4 and thereby eliminate that controversy.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I fortunately have the floor, and I shall again insist that the Senator answer the question which I have asked him, and which he has not yet answered, and that is this: If the Senator does not personally know that already in certain States represented by Senators who voted against the Sutherland amendment in February last, Kansas among them, it has already been attempted to bring to bear upon the Senators who voted against the Sutherland amendment a racial pressure for the purpose of compelling them now to support what they then voted against? Does not the Senator know that personally?

Mr. BRISTOW. Oh, no. The Senator, as he frequently does, puts the question in a way that the answer yes or no can not be made.

Mr. BACON. It is inconvenient to answer. I recognize that.

Mr. BRISTOW. Since he refers to the State of Kansas, I am perfectly free to say that it has been made the subject of more or less controversy in the State as to whether or not, in amending section 3, section 4 also ought to be amended; and I am free to say that there are a great many very worthy men in Kansas who think that section 4 should not be changed.

They attribute to the change of section 4 a great deal more weight than I do, and the Senator from Utah attributes a great deal more weight to the change in section 4 than I do. But no man who is not blind can deny the fact that the adoption of the amendment as reported by the committee injects into this a question that ought to be kept out of it. It is not the question of taking from the Federal Government a power which it now has.

I do not believe that it takes away from the Federal Government the power to appoint a marshal or to organize an army, as the Senator from Georgia indicates with such emphasis. If the Federal Government can organize an army now to protect the honesty and the integrity of elections in the South, we can organize an army, in my judgment, just as well after the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary is adopted, and no better. But the adoption of the amendment in that form gives an opportunity for the men who oppose the reform in our political institutions to make the contest against it upon broader grounds, and therefore more nearly encompass its defeat. My sole purpose in the efforts I have made to get this adopted is to get it before the people in a clear and simple form, so that the naked question shall stand out, Shall the people of the United States elect their Senators by direct vote, or, in order to get permission to do that, shall they consent to the change in section 4 and to taking from the Federal Government an authority which it now has? And that proviso ought not to be interjected into this fight.

Mr. BACON. I have listened with great patience to the Senator replying to a very simple question, to which I do not think he has yet replied. But I did not intend to interrupt the Senator as long as he desired to continue the discussion of the general merits of the question.

The Senator himself lugged into this controversy what had not been brought into it before—the racial question.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. With the greatest respect for the Senator from Georgia, I deny that I lugged into this question the racial question.

Mr. BACON. I withdraw the word "lugged."

Mr. BRISTOW. Or that I precipitated, or that I injected it, or that I brought it into the debate in any way.

Any man of ordinary intelligence knows that the controversy which the Senator from Georgia has been carrying on here for months against this amendment has been because of racial prejudice that exists in that section of the country. There is no use to deal here with obscure and indefinite terms.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, there are some things which are inseparable and necessarily grow out of conditions. But still there is such a thing as a discussion of matters upon general principles without reference to those special conditions, and I think I can call the Senate to witness that the Senator from Kansas himself for the first time to-day brought in the racial question. That is all I meant to suggest in regard to it; and as the Senator did it, I want to ask him a question. I have asked him several times, and I wanted to ask him to see if I could get a direct reply from him.

That is not only what is going to happen in the future. I wanted to ask the Senator, and have asked him, and again ask him, if he does not know the fact not simply that probably there will be a controversy such as he suggests, but does he not know the fact that in States represented on this floor by Senators who voted against the Sutherland amendment, since that time there has been instituted a racial insistence and influence sought to be brought to bear on racial grounds against the action, insisting that they should now vote for the Sutherland amendment, or the Bristow amendment, whichever you please to call it? The Senator knows the fact.

Mr. BRISTOW. If I have not answered the Senator's question, I do not know how to do it.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator say yes?

Mr. BRISTOW. I can not say yes in direct terms to the question, because it would not be exactly true. That is the reason why I do not say yes. I have given the Senator my answer.

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, I will not insist further upon a more categorical answer, but I do not understand that the Senator has either said yes or no. For that reason I have insisted.

But, as we are on that question, I want to say another word in regard to it. I know the fact, Mr. President, and there are Senators who sit within the sound of my voice who know the fact, and none of them will get up and deny it, that Senators who voted against the proposition known as the Sutherland amendment will now vote for it under the new name of the Bristow amendment, and that various and sundry influences have been brought to bear on them to induce them to do that. One was that I have mentioned. I know the fact that not only in their own States was the racial influence sought to be brought to bear on them and that its political influence on their fortunes has been presented to them, but I know they have come around this Capitol and called out from this Chamber Senators who voted against the Sutherland amendment and have told them that they had organized in this country and that they intended that Senators who voted against the Bristow amendment or the Sutherland amendment, as it might be, should hear from them in the future.

I know the fact that under the Dome of this Capitol that threat has been made to Senators. Yet we are to be told that there is nothing in this amendment; that there is no purpose to enforce it; that it is a mere moot question; that the time has passed when there is ever going to be sought the exercise of power under it. Yet those who are insisting upon it are personally threatening Senators with what will be their political downfall if they vote to interfere with the exercise of this power by the Federal Government in the control of the election in the States.

Mr. President, if I am not speaking the truth, let any Senator here rise and question the truth of my statement.

That is not all, Mr. President. There have been other powerful influences sought to be exercised upon Senators to control their vote in this matter. Would Senators within the sound of my voice be willing to send to the desk and have read from the desk the letters which they have received from persons of influence in this country insisting upon it that this amendment to the Constitution shall have engrafted upon it this power to interfere with the election in the States? I challenge the Senators to send to the desk the letters which they have received on this subject. Senators know they have received these letters. It can not be accounted for, Mr. President, on the ground that it is a moot question.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. WORKS. I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia whether he makes that statement generally of all Senators?

Mr. BACON. By no means.

Mr. WORKS. If he does, I want to deny that I have received any letters on any amendment of that sort.

Mr. BACON. I certainly did not have the Senator from California in mind. I would be very glad to have a denial from each Senator present. That would very soon settle the question; and if each Senator will rise in his place and say he has not received them, I will most cheerfully withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I will deny it for the State of Colorado.

Mr. BACON. Now, I will wait for the others. [A pause.] Well, Mr. President, it seems that there are only two.

Mr. CUMMINS. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is he imputing to Senators some wrong motive? Is he suggesting improper influence as being brought to bear upon them? If so, he ought to be very specific.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, when the Senator has finished his question I will be more than pleased to answer. Has the Senator finished his question?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have finished that question.

Mr. BACON. Very well; let me answer it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will say, however, to avoid interrupting him again——

Mr. BACON. No; I rather prefer that the Senator would let me answer that question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator certainly did not understand my proposition or he would not have asked the question. I was discussing the point whether this is a moot question, whether the insistence upon the incorporation of this feature in the proposed amendment to the Constitution is a harmless one, whether it is one never intended to be exercised. I have said simply as an evidence of the fact that it is not a moot question; that it is a live question; that it is one that is intended to be made a practical question; that prominent men are insisting upon it that this power shall be given the Government to interfere in the senatorial elections in the States. They have got a right to so insist. Nobody will claim that it is improper. Of course they have a right to so insist.

Every Senator is in a position where he can properly receive suggestions from his constituents or from people throughout the country. There can not be any possible suggestion of impropriety in it. The sole purpose I had was to illustrate my contention that it is not a moot question; that it is a live question; that it is a question people are insisting upon, because they recognize it as a practical question, and that it is not, as some of our friends say, a question that can never be practical and that the time will never come when the power is sought to be exercised. I am simply endeavoring to show to the Senate that there is a sentiment in the country in favor of it, an active sentiment and not a dormant one, a sentiment to make a practical use of it and not simply a sentimental one to retain it upon the statute books.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield further to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I intended to add to the statement before the Senator from Georgia answered my question that I voted against the Sutherland amendment in February last, and I have received just one letter upon that subject since that time, and that letter came from the District of Columbia, not from my own State. I have never heard my vote criticized. Does that answer the Senator from Georgia with respect to that?

Mr. BACON. So far as the Senator from Iowa is concerned, it certainly answers the question as to him, and I wish again to disclaim any possible imputation on my part of any impropriety in any man who wrote the letter or any Senator who received it.

My sole purpose was to illustrate the contention which I made in the beginning, that it is not a moot question, that it is not a dormant question, but a live question, a practical question. That is illustrated by the fact that in certain racial circles there is an insistence, and outside of all racial considerations there is an insistence which can not be possibly reconciled with the idea that it is a moot question, a dormant question, something which shall never have any practical feature connected with it. That is my sole purpose in making the suggestion.

Mr. President, I have, of course, no disposition to insist upon any further disclaimers in regard to that. I simply use it for the purpose I have indicated. It is my belief, as I have endeavored to submit to the Senate this afternoon, that the adoption of this resolution amending the Constitution and, at the same time, denying to the States the right which they practically now have to control the election of Senators, and to clothe the Federal Government with the power to go into the State and use all the machinery which they now can use as to the House of Representatives, is to unsettle the very foundation of this Government and to destroy the stability of the tenure of office of Senators, and that it is the strongest blow which could possibly be stricken at the power of the States.

We hear, Mr. President, a great many protestations from Senators as to their loyalty to the rights of the States. It is not true, as my distinguished and learned friend from Kansas says, that the question of State rights is a dead issue, by any means. Men of all parties—I do not say all men of all parties, but distinguished men of all parties—are rather proud of the opportunity to allege and avow their loyalty to the States and to the rights of the States, and the Senator who does not recognize that it is just as much his duty to preserve the rights of the States as it is to defend the rights of the Union, in my opinion, has not correctly read the Constitution and laws of this country and does not properly appreciate the relation which the one bears to the other.

I say we hear a great deal of that. Yet, Mr. President, when the time comes and this proposition is presented and the other proposition is presented in which there is an encroachment on the rights of the States, one by one the blocks are removed and the constitutional structure is weakened. I repeat that we should consider the great office which the Senate was intended to fill, the great office which it should fill, as the representative of the States, the great office which it should fill, in view of the fact that in the framework of this Government the States were not only given the control of their own affairs, but they were given greater power in the direction of the governmental affairs of the United States than all other influences put together, in the fact that there is no governmental function but what the Senate in its representation of the States is required to take its part and in which its assent is necessary, whereas there are other functions in which the Executive has no part, there are other functions in which the House has no part, and there are of course many functions in which the judiciary has no part; but so far as constructive legislation is concerned or destructive legislation, if you please, because I think we have some of each kind, no step can be taken except the consent of the Senate is had for it. When we put it in a position where other influences outside of the State, such as can be brought to bear through registrars and supervisors of election and judges of election and marshals and troops, if you please, at the polls can determine the question who shall be sent as a Senator from a State, sir, in my opinion a greater blow will have been stricken against the power of the States and the rights of the States than has ever been stricken in the history of government.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, we are confronted by a rather unique situation. The last session of congress witnessed the culmination of a battle for popular government that had been waged for a century. Into the contest there was at the last session injected a question which was practically new to the American people. The proposition was embodied in what was then known as the Sutherland amendment.

The legislatures of, I think, more than 30 States had demanded an amendment to the Constitution conferring upon the people the full right by direct vote to determine the membership of this body. I am not aware of the question which was raised by the Sutherland amendment having ever been discussed in a single legislature, or of it having been debated or brought forward in a State convention of either party. Four or five times the House of Representatives has passed resolutions purposed to confer the right of direct elections upon the people. In each instance the Senate has stood—I had almost said stubbornly—against the vote of the House of Representatives and opposed to the will of the people of the United States. At last, when recruits are coming to this great reform from the Republican side of this Chamber, and when it begins to look as though action is about to be taken in consummation of the prayers and demands of the people, just at the moment when we apparently are about to give the sovereign citizen an opportunity to vote, the "Sutherland" amendment—rechristened the "Bristow" amendment—is again suddenly brought forward.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BORAH. Would the Senator yield while I prefer a request?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. As nearly as I can ascertain those who desire to speak upon this subject have in a large measure concluded. With the exception of one or two others, possibly, and after consultation with a number of Senators, I am going to ask unanimous consent that the vote upon the resolution and the amendments begin at 8.15.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not think that it is possible for us to modify the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. BORAH. That is not modifying the unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. The unanimous-consent agreement was to vote before the end of the legislative day. I think it is a very bad form of unanimous consent, but that was the form. It would be a distinct modification to fix a specific time.

Mr. BORAH. We can undoubtedly modify it by unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. No; I think not. The unanimous-consent agreement must stand. The same Senators who made it may not be here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts objects. The Senator from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Sutherland amendment at the last session placed direct election in jeopardy by interjecting into the simple, great question, viz, "Shall the people be permitted to elect their Senators?" a proposition sectional in its character and in large measure subversive of the very object sought to be attained by changing the Constitution.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. JONES. Does the Senator mean to say that in the last session of the last Congress was the first time an amendment had been offered striking out the provision to which he refers?

Mr. REED. No; I did not mean that.

Mr. JONES. I thought the Senator did.

Mr. REED. I mean to say that it is the first time the scheme to curtail the power of the people of the States to conduct the contemplated senatorial elections free from Federal interference was ever given real public and national prominence. That it had been previously suggested is beyond question. But the suggestion was disregarded. It fell dead from the lips which uttered it.

Mr. JONES. I simply want to call attention to the fact that in the House of Representatives—I do not remember in just what Congress—a similar resolution was reported by the committee, and upon objection being made, by unanimous consent, the provision that is objected to here was eliminated.

Mr. REED. Yes; it was not then regarded as meriting discussion, but it was brought forward in the Senate at the last session and a battle waged for it; the lines were then sharply drawn.

We now find this peculiar situation, that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], who only last February voted against the Sutherland amendment, now introduces it as his own. It is even stated, with how much correctness I do not know, that several Senators who are commonly known as "insurgents" have likewise reversed themselves and are cooperating with the Senator from Kansas in the effort to kill this bill by the very amendment they denounced and voted against only four months ago.

Mr. President, I have hitherto looked with great favor upon the movement known as "insurgency." I had begun to believe that once more in the history of the world a good thing was "coming out of Nazareth." If, however, it be true that so many of the insurgents have thus suddenly and mysteriously reversed themselves, I shall be forced to agree with a gentleman who the other day declared, "The standpatter occupies well-known ground, the Democrat likewise occupies well-known ground, but the insurgent has no ground whatever to stand on"—he is simply "up in the air." [Laughter.] The other evening the Hibernian conductor of a crowded street car thrust his red head through the door and shouted, "Will thim as is standin' in front move up so that thim as is standin' behind can take the places of thim as is standin' in front, and leave places for thim as is standin' nowhere." [Laughter.] The latter class of unfortunates aptly typifies the insurgent, particularly if he intends to change in this ready and shifty manner. If he is not now, he soon will be standing nowhere, and for no thing, long enough to be located or classified.

What is the reason assigned by the Senator from Kansas for this change which has come over the spirit of his philosophy? He asserts that there are "influences at work." What does he mean by "influences"? Judging by the dramatic and withering manner in which he pronounces the word "influence," and considering also his favorite theme upon the hustings, one would imagine that he means by "influences at work," the "dark, sinister methods of corporate powers"; that the "great trusts," the "criminal combines," the "fearsome octopuses" the Senator from Kansas so persistently and so valiantly fights, constitute the diabolic "influences at work." Yet the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] during a half hour's cross-examination was utterly unable to extract a categorical declaration as to what these "influences" were, where they came from or how manifested. The Senator from Kansas did not specify the trusts, neither could he be cajoled or coerced into a direct answer to the question whether "the influences" were not the colored man and brother who hibernate in the State of Kansas. Pressed again and yet again, he continued to avoid an answer by painful evasion and involved circumlocution. I venture the assertion that the distinguished Senator from Kansas can not point to a trust magnate, can not point to a great corporation that has, since he cast his vote against the proposition he now introduces, begun a crusade against this measure. The trusts and trust magnates have been at all times, and under all circumstances, against any and all efforts to confer upon the people the right to elect the Members of the Senate.

I greatly fear that the "influences at work"—the influences which have reached the ear and changed the opinion of the Senator from Kansas, the influences which have sent him to the "right-about" and started him scurrying to the rear—originated with the colored voices and colored voters of the State of Kansas. Dark therefore are the "influences," even if not sinister.

I wage war against no race, nor kind, nor class of men, but if it be true that the Senator from Kansas has changed his position because of subserviency to the colored voter; if that influence is so potential in the councils of the Republican Party; if it can make Senators load this century-old struggle with the incubus of an iniquitous amendment curtailing the powers of great States and limiting the rights of the people thereof, then it is time for every man who is devoted to his country and its constitution, who loves the State where he resides and finds protection under just laws enacted without Federal interference, who yields loyal fealty to this indissolvable Union of sovereign States, to pause and consider well before he allows a contemplated amendment to the Constitution to be emasculated at the dictation of such an "influence."

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that the amendment which I introduced some two years ago last April was in substantially the form in which I introduced it on the opening of the present session, and it embodied my general views then as it does now.

Mr. REED. Then the Senator is a living illustration of the doctrine that "statesmen oft to shifty uses bend." He was for the Sutherland amendment two years ago; he changed and was against it four months ago; he has changed a second time and is for it now. If we should take a "continuance of the case," I have no doubt he would be against it next week—always provided the colored "influences" became in the interim innocuous.

Mr. CULBERSON. He would be for it.

Mr. REED. Nay, I have it right. If he is for it now, he will likely be against it next week.

Mr. President, I want to discuss this question for a few minutes from another standpoint. It is a mere playing with words, a mere juggling with the English language to say that, because the proposed amendment omits all reference to section 4 of Article I, it does not radically change the effect of that section. The vice of the Bristow amendment lies in the very fact that it does fail to mention section 4. The truth, however paradoxical it may appear, is that the failure to change section 4 does in fact work a change of a most radical character, because, as the Constitution now stands, section 4 applies to elections by the legislatures, but when we change the Constitution so that the legislatures shall no longer elect and confer the power of election upon the people, then the language of section 4, if it be not also changed, will immediately apply to elections held by the people. Section 3 provides:

> Senators of the United States * * * shall be chosen by the legislatures thereof. * * *

The language of section 4 is:

> The times, the places, and the manner of holding elections of Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislatures thereof, but Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations except as to the places of choosing Senators.

This right of Congress therefore to regulate the election of Senators is, as the Constitution now stands, strictly limited to regulations applicable to elections held by the various State legislatures. But when we change, as we propose in the joint resolution, section 3, so that it shall read:

> Senators of the United States shall be * * * chosen by the people of the various States—then if we do not at the same time change the language of section 4 it will become applicable at once to elections held by the people. The words of section 4, which now in their application are limited to a control of legislative elections, will at once extend the power and control of Congress over elections held by the people themselves. Thus there will be a direct extension of power and a direct authorization to the Federal authorities, giving them the right to invade the polling booths, take charge of the machinery of the election, and supervise the action of the sovereign citizens when they come to cast their votes in their home precincts. And yet gentlemen have the temerity to stand in this body and argue that the Bristow amendment, simply because it does not refer to section 4, does not in effect change that section of the Constitution, when the patent fact is that because the Bristow amendment fails to change section 4 to conform with the proposed change in section 3 the powers conferred by section 4 become immediately applicable to popular elections instead of, as at present, being confined to legislative elections.

Why, sir, under the law, as it now stands, when the people assemble to cast their votes for members of the general assemblies, the Federal Government can not appoint a supervisor of elections; the Government can not send a man into the State for the purpose of supervising the registration of voters; the Government can not in any manner interfere in that election when it is confined to State officers; its powers are strictly limited to congressional elections. But if this act is passed, as drawn by the Senator from Kansas, the power of the Government to invade the ballot box of the citizen and to interfere with the vote of the citizen becomes absolute and complete.

It is mere begging of the question for gentlemen to say that we are interfering with the fourth section of Article I because we provide that it shall not apply where it does not now apply. The truth is, the advocates of the Sutherland amendment—now introduced by the Senator from Kansas and rechristened by his illustrious name—are making the fourth section apply where it does not now apply, and are conferring on Congress for the first time the power to interfere with the people in the selection of a United States Senator. As it is to-day the sovereign voter goes to the polls without let or hindrance of the Government and casts his vote for a member of the legislature. That is the crucial thing. The crux of the matter is the right of the citizen to cast his vote without Federal interference. After the citizen has cast his vote and after he has elected a man to represent him in the legislature, then the right of the Federal Government for the first time attaches—for the first time it may be exercised—to do what? Merely to designate the time when and the manner in which the agent of the voter, to wit, the man he sent to the legislature, may cast the vote of his principal—the citizen. Congress can not go into the ballot box; Congress can not interfere with the sovereign right of the citizen to name the men who, as members of the general assembly, name the Senators. Let me illustrate how the Bristow bill will result in a vast extension of Federal authority. I will take, for example, a city in my own State, the city of St. Louis——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I merely desire to ask the Senator a question. The Senator did not mean to imply that Congress had no power now in regard to the election of members of the legislature?

Mr. REED. I meant to say that Congress had no power now except its general power to interfere in the matter of election of Members of the House of Representatives, and that Congress does not have the power to interfere with the citizen who is voting for a member of the general assembly of his own State. Congress has no power to take charge of such an election. The State, and not the National Government, regulates and conducts such an election.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator, I think, has for the moment forgotten the provision of the second section of the fourteenth amendment, which is as follows:

> But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, etc.

Mr. REED. Do I understand that the Senator maintains that under that provision Congress could appoint registrars for the election in a State, take charge of the election machinery, and conduct the election?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, not at all. I do not know what the Senator means exactly by "registrars," but I mean that Congress has the power over the election of members of the legislature to the extent that it is granted by the fourteenth amendment——

Mr. REED. Yes; and no further. That section simply provides that when any of the male inhabitants of a State over 21 years of age are denied the right to vote, the basis of representation in Congress shall be correspondingly reduced. We are not at variance on that subject.

Mr. LODGE. And no further.

Mr. REED. When I was interrupted, I was about to illustrate how the powers granted by the Bristow amendment might be so exercised by the Federal Government as to completely control an election and absolutely subvert the will of the people of a State. For the purpose of illustration, I take the great city of St. Louis. Under the law as it now exists, if the citizens of St. Louis are about to elect members of the general assembly, they do so without any interference on the part of the Federal Government. The Federal Government neither interferes nor has it the power to interfere. Prior to the election, the recorders of the voters—registrars of the election, if you please—are appointed by the governor of the State. These recorders of voters, for all practical purposes, have absolute power to say whose names shall be recorded upon the voting lists. Thus these local officers, appointed by local authority, determine who shall vote; but, Mr. President, when you pass the Bristow amendment you will have conferred on the Federal Government the right to name the officers who shall register the voters. The power to determine who may register is the power to determine who may vote. The power to determine who may vote is the power to determine the result of the election. In practical operation this too frequently occurs. Indeed, it is openly charged that the result in a recent election in St. Louis was accomplished simply by means of a padded registration list.

Again, as the law now stands, the judges and clerks of election are appointed by local authority, but if you pass the Bristow amendment, the Federal Government will have the right to appoint supervisors or judges of election, to control the ballot boxes, and to cast up and certify the result. These judges may be appointed of the citizens of a State or they may be mere Federal carpetbaggers sent into a Commonwealth for the purpose of procuring a fraudulent result. It will not do to answer this objection by asserting that there having been corruption under local authorities—as admitted in the illustration I have just used—therefore we need the interposition of national authority.

The point I am trying to drive home here is this: That the power to say who shall register means the power to say who shall carry a State; the power to supervise the ballot and certify the returns likewise means the power to say who shall carry a State. That power now exists in the States, but the moment you pass the Bristow amendment the local authorities of the State, nay, even the people thereof, no longer possess their present power. You take it from them and confer upon the Federal Government the absolute authority to take charge of the entire election machinery and to determine by their certification, false or otherwise, who shall sit in this body.

Mr. President, I do not desire to take the time of the Senate except for a few minutes longer. It has been said by the advocates of the Bristow amendment that the question of race and race prejudice has unfortunately been thrust into this debate. Who thrust it in? If the Bristow amendment had not been offered in this body, the joint resolution adopted by the House of Representatives would have been passed here to-day or long before this date, and the people of the United States, in their several general assemblies, would have been privileged to vote upon the proposition at once or as soon as their general assemblies might be convened. The joint resolution comes here from the House of Representatives, backed by an overwhelming vote; why should we at this time—at this late hour—load it down with amendments? Who are for the Bristow amendment? I frankly admit some men are for it who honestly favor conferring the power upon the people to elect their Senators. But who else is for it? Every man who does not believe in the direct election of United States Senators is for this Bristow amendment. Every single Senator on the other side of this Chamber who is against granting this power to the people will vote to load it with the Bristow amendment.

These Senators are not voting for the Bristow amendment because they think it strengthens the joint resolution, but because they believe it will load the resolution with an incubus that will postpone its adoption by the State legislatures; nay, more, they indulge the desire and hope that this amendment will effectually kill for all time the joint resolution as reported to us by the House of Representatives. Who else will be for the Bristow amendment? If it be true that the great interests of this country are opposing this measure, such interests will with one voice support Senator BRISTOW'S proposition, and every newspaper owned or controlled by the sinister influences at which the Senator from Kansas darkly hints will be found arrayed in support of his amendment. But if you kill the Bristow amendment, if you pass the joint resolution here as it was passed by the House of Representatives, then, Mr. President, the people of this country will at last and at once have the opportunity through their various State legislatures to pass upon this great question which has so long been dear to the hearts of the American people.

Load it with the Bristow amendment, and the joint resolution must go back to the House of Representatives. Then will, in all probability, come the delay of conference and possibly failure of agreement. If finally the joint resolution as passed by the House is passed after conference here, comes before the general assemblies for their action, unburdened by the Sutherland-Bristow amendment, what argument can be presented against it by the enemies of popular government? They can only say, "You are conferring too much power upon the States. You ought not to accept this power yourselves. You ought to express a doubt of your own honesty and of your own capacity. You ought to resolve that you are incapable of self-government. You should go back and place yourself under the wings of Congress. You need the supervising help of the Federal Government. You can not trust yourselves."

Will that argument obtain in the legislature of your State, or yours, or yours, or yours? Will not the Legislature of Massachusetts say: "We do not need Federal interference; we can pass laws that will guard our elections and will keep the ballot safe and sacred"? Will not the Legislature of New York say the same thing? Will not the Legislature of the proud State of Kansas also say that Kansas is able to regulate the elections of Kansas? And, if Kansas, and New York, and Massachusetts, then why not all the other States of this Union? Why are they not all, my fellow Senators, able to keep the ballot pure and to see that the will of the sovereign people is fairly expressed and registered?

And now a final word to the real friends of popular government—to all Members of this body who honestly desire that it be purged of every influence save that which emanates from the hearts and brains of the people; to those whose favorite aphorism is, "The voice of the people is the voice of God," I want to make a most urgent appeal, especially do I appeal to the insurgent Senators—who, after all, I believe, will by their votes respond to the voice of conscience—I ask you this question: If by loading this joint resolution with the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] you are not emasculating, nay, assisting in destroying that great principle of popular government which you so much profess to love? Why, sir, what is the essence of the great question now before the Senate? It is that there shall be taken from the State legislatures the powers they now possess and that these powers shall be directly conferred upon the people. Why? Because it has been found by experience that the agent does not so well represent his master's interests as the master can himself. Why now repudiate the doctrine that the people can be completely intrusted with the power to govern themselves?

The devices which were originated as safeguards against action by the people have in the bitter school of experience been proven obstacles to progress and instruments of fraud and oppression. That is the pith and kernel of the matter. Therefore the nearer you place the Government to the people the more perfect control you give the people; the more complete domination you give the people the nearer you come to realizing the ideal which has been in the hearts and brains of patriots since the days of Jefferson—that is in your heart and brain at this hour.

What does the Bristow amendment propose to do? Reduced to plain language, its declaration is: "Yes, you are a sovereign people, a great people, a people that we trust; therefore we will give you the right to vote for United States Senators; you are endowed with the intelligence to select a United States Senator; you possess the honesty to select a United States Senator, but you neither possess the honesty nor the intelligence to conduct such an election. We will therefore not give you the right to select your Senators clean-cut and clear; we will have Congress put hobbles upon this right; we will confer upon some Federal understrapper the power to supervise the elections which you as a sovereign people hold. We will give to these Federal agents the right to take charge of your ballot boxes and determine your qualifications as electors."

One further observation directed to those who advocate this amendment because they still entertain a desire to maintain Federal domination over the Southern States. Senators, we do not legislate for a day or for an hour. I do not believe that any political party or any government ever gained substantial advantage by doing a thing for narrow, temporary, or prejudiced reasons.

We are legislating not for to-day, but for the conditions and circumstances which may arise in the long years to come. We are often told that "a great cloud hangs over the Republic; that vast aggregations of wealth already are extending their potentiality in so many directions and controlling in so many departments of the Government that the very liberties of the people are in peril." I do not desire to engage in extreme or inflammatory declamation regarding this danger; but let us for a moment concede that the danger exists. Let us assume that the present trend and march of events continues for a few more years. Let us assume that wealth heaps high its hoard and that mammon continues to grow great and powerful in the Republic. It does not require an inflamed imagination to conceive that under such conditions the power of massed and fortified wealth could become sufficiently great to ultimately secure the election of a President of the United States who may bend to its will and become the subject of its purposes. If such a President shall ever be unfortunately selected, and we by our acts to-day have conferred upon him the power to appoint United States marshals, legally authorized to surround our polls; to appoint registers of elections, lawfully empowered to invade the election booth; to appoint men duly vested with authority to count the ballots in every State of the Union, how think you that power will be exercised in the great battle then to be waged—aye, even now being waged—between men and money, between the creatures created by God and the monsters erected by cupidity? Insurgents, I put it to you; when that time comes, if it shall ever come, the battle will not be one originating in race prejudices; it will not be a question between the black man and the white man, between the North and the South; but it will be a mighty struggle between the people of this country and the only "influences" we have reason to fear in the present hour—the tremendous and overmastering power and force of wealth, organized, mighty, and too often unscrupulous and cruel.

Let us therefore not place the power to control elections in the hands of a President who may unfortunately become a wicked instrument or weak tool in the hands of those great "influences." Let us give to no man and to no central government the right of interference. Rather let us place this power in the hands of the people untrammeled and unrestricted. Let us tie no cords about it. Let us not hamstring popular government at the very moment we are pretending to confer it. Let us give to the people the fullest right, the amplest authority, under their own laws, in their own way and in their own good time to elect the Members of the United States Senate. Let us so hedge this right of the people about that no Federal officer—aye, though he be the President himself—dare lay the hand of power upon it.

There may have been corrupt elections in some States; there may be here and there something of evil done, but I tell you, Senators, that the man who does not believe the sovereign citizens of the different States will not in the end pass just laws, hold fair elections, maintain honest government, and preserve the Union, has lost faith in the Republic and does not belong beneath our flag.

I affirm that you can trust the people. You can trust the people of Colorado, although they are at present involved in legislative turmoil. You can trust the people of Kansas, although their Senator believes they need Federal supervision. You can trust the people of Missouri and New York and Massachusetts. You can trust the people of the great Western States, whose Representatives for the most part are here to-day giving their support to popular government. You can trust the people of all the States of this Union, whether of the North or of the South, of the East or of the West.

To those of you who oppose popular government; to those of you who fear to intrust to the State legislatures the enactment of proper laws for the conduct of honest elections; to those of you who insist that the people should not be granted the right of a direct vote for United States Senators, I ask you, in God's name, if you can trust the people to elect general assemblies wise enough to elect Senators, why can you not trust them to themselves wisely elect Senators? If you can trust a State legislature at the present time to elect United States Senators, why can you not trust the same legislature to pass wise and just laws regulating the election of United States Senators by the people? A man who votes for the Bristow amendment votes his lack of confidence in the State he represents; votes his lack of confidence in the people of the various States, and gives the lie to every protestation he may utter of confidence in the people of the United States.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I had not intended to say a word in this debate until within the last few minutes, and would not speak now did I not feel that it is just to myself that I should say something concerning my position.

In the first place, it is very apparent that after an agitation extending over several years a majority of the people of this country favor the election of Senators by direct vote of the people. A large majority of the States of this Union have so declared. I bow in submission to the people's will, and shall vote in favor of conferring the power upon the people of the States by direct vote to elect their Senators.

I have not found in any of the resolutions passed by any of the State legislatures any request that section 4 of Article I of the Constitution should be repealed. While the people have asked, through their legislatures, for the privilege of electing their Senators directly, they have not asked in any instance that all power of the Congress of the United States to protect itself should be withdrawn.

One would think from speeches that have been made here that an effort is being made now to give Congress the right to fix time, place, and manner of electing Senators. Such right has been in the Constitution of the United States from the time it was adopted, and during all these long and eventful years I do not remember any Senator who has referred to an unjust exercise of that power in any election of a Senator. If it has ever been unjustly exercised, so far as the Senate of the United States is concerned, I am not aware of it, but all at once there seems to be a terrible dread that the Congress of the United States, or those who may be in the majority, are preparing in the future to take some sort of reprehensible step. We have gone through all these years of travail, and we have never felt it necessary to engage in anything of this sort. Those of us who favor the Bristow amendment are asked, "Why do you favor it? Do you expect to do something in the future? Do you expect to enforce this section of the Constitution in the future to the detriment of Southern States?" We might as well ask them, "Why do you desire to obliterate the Constitution of the United States, under which we have lived for so long, to prevent the Congress of the United States from exercising any power in a matter of this sort? Do you expect in future to do some reprehensible thing?" One question is just as legitimate as the other. I do not believe that a great body like the Congress of the United States should surrender all power and control over fixing the time, place, and manner of electing its Senators.

Such has not been asked, so far as the election of Members of the House is concerned, although it is claimed that great injustice has been done by legislation as to that body in the past concerning the election of its Members. Yet there is no proposition now, so far as the lower House is concerned, to deprive Congress of its power to fix the time, places, and manner of electing Members of that body. But, strange to say, the Senate, and the Senate alone, is asked to be deprived of this power.

What does it mean? We have been asked what it means for us to oppose it. I ask what does it mean that you who ask it do not desire to elect Senators by direct vote of the people of the States unless the legislatures of the different States can control that matter and the Senate be deprived of the power it has exercised for so many years?

Now, Mr. President, I want to make more pointed my objection to the legislatures of the States controlling this matter, and I shall make it by a reference to my own State. In 1893, more than 17 years ago, an apportionment bill was passed by the Legislature of the State of Kentucky and an apportionment made such as I declare here and now is a disgrace and a shameful denial of representation to the people. What was that apportionment bill? In the first place, I will refer to the fourth, the seventh, and the eighth congressional districts as now constituted. The eighth under the census of 1910 has 148,313 votes; the fourth, 210,406 votes; the seventh, 151,051 votes; while the eleventh congressional district, a Republican district, has 308,348 votes.

Now, that is a specimen of congressional apportionment. Let us go a little further to the apportionment of State senatorial districts. In the ninth district there are 52,925 people; in the twenty-first, 35,586 people; in the thirtieth, 31,595 people. These are Democratic districts.

Now, turn to the other side—Republican districts: In the thirty-third there are 145,075 people; in the seventh, 72,045; in the seventeenth, 163,610.

Now, let us proceed a little further and see what the legislative apportionment was: In the eighth Democratic district of Kentucky, 14,539; in the twenty-fifth district, Republican, 26,274; in the twenty-first district, Democratic, 11,460; in the ninety-eighth, Republican, 43,511; in the seventeenth district, Democratic, 13,241; in the ninety-third, a Republican district, 59,244; in the twenty-ninth legislative district, Democratic, 8,512; in the ninety-seventh, Republican, 40,037; in the thirtieth district, Democratic, 9,763; in the ninety-ninth, a Republican district, 18,475; in the sixty-fourth, a Democratic district, 14,063; in the sixty-ninth, a Republican district, 54,098.

I have given only a few of the most glaring inequalities contained in the apportionment bill of 1893.

Five years ago the Legislature of Kentucky, upon whom it is now proposed to confer the power to fix the time, manner, and place of electing United States Senators, after having passed the constitutional limit of 10 years in which to make an apportionment by three years, passed a new apportionment bill much worse than that of 1893.

An appeal was made to the courts, and the Court of Appeals of Kentucky, in passing on an appeal from the court below, declared that apportionment to be unconstitutional and set it aside. (See Ragland v. Anderson, 125 Ky., 141.) And in the later case of Adams v. Bosworth (126 Ky., 64) that court expressed the opinion that the next legislature would comply with its duty and pass a constitutional measure. That legislature, however, met and ignored the opinion of the court of appeals, and this infamous gerrymander to-day stands the creature of the Democratic Legislature of the State of Kentucky, denying substantially the right of representation to our people, and yet we are asked to vote for an amendment here which will confer upon the Legislature of Kentucky the right to fix the time, the manner, and the place of electing United States Senators.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BRADLEY. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. I should like to ask the Senator, without reflecting upon the legislature in Kentucky or impeaching that in any other State, if he is not aware that even a worse condition is alleged to exist in the State of Rhode Island——

Mr. BRADLEY. I do not——

Mr. GORE. Where the city of Providence, with a population of 200,000—a voting population of 40,000—elects one member of the State senate and another town, with a voting population, I believe, of 126, elects a member of the State senate.

Mr. BRADLEY. It may be, Mr. President, that the statement is correct, but that is only another argument in favor of the position I assume. If the statement is true, the Legislature of Rhode Island can not be trusted to do justice to the people in the election of United States Senators.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRADLEY. Yes.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky if he has examined the gerrymander that was perpetrated by the Federal authorities on the people of New Mexico recently, in which they gave the Republicans about four times the representation they did the Democrats—done by the Federal authorities?

Mr. BRADLEY. I have not examined it. I never heard of it before, and if it be true, I condemn it. I condemn anything of that sort by any party anywhere, and I do not see why the Senate of the United States, that has been intrusted with this power for all these years and has never done a wrong, never done a thing that can be complained of, can not be intrusted with the same power hereafter. We should not be compelled to give up every vestige of power that we have; to surrender it to the States and to say that we stand here in the presence of injustice and wrong unarmed and defenseless.

Let me ask the Senator from Missouri a question. What Federal authority in New Mexico fixed that proposition?

Mr. REED. It was fixed by the Federal authorities in fixing the districts under which they voted down there.

Mr. BRADLEY. Not for the legislature——

Mr. REED. No; for the election of the men who were to write the constitution—the very fundamental law.

Mr. BRADLEY. As I understand, the Territorial Legislature of New Mexico arranged the apportionment. A similar one was arranged by the Democratic Territorial Legislature of Arizona, even more reprehensible. But this only strengthens my position.

Mr. REED. If the Senator so strongly condemns the gerrymandering of States and says you can not trust the legislature in the future to pass laws regulating elections, I want to ask him if it is not those same gerrymandering legislatures that sent us here?

Mr. BRADLEY. Notwithstanding all this gerrymandering in the State of Kentucky, the Democratic majority was only eight—one of the number died, and four of the others had good sense enough to vote for me for the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia to the substitute offered by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, this joint resolution and the provisions of the Bristow substitute, then known as the Sutherland amendment, were fully discussed at the last session of Congress, and I have no desire to thrash over old straw or to prolong the debate here, and yet the provisions of the Bristow substitute render it so obnoxious to a Democrat that I can not refrain from briefly referring to them.

I take it to be that those who favor the election of Senators by the people would prefer to have that amendment to the Constitution presented without any complications, but, unfortunately, that is impossible. A change other than the simple election of Senators by the people is inevitable. And the question to be decided is whether that change shall be made by relinquishing the power in the Federal Government to make or alter the regulations for fixing the time and the manner of electing the Senators, or whether it shall be the vital change which consists in an extension of the power of the Federal Government over the popular election of Senators. One or the other change must be made. It is merely a question of which change shall be made. I assume it to be true that the power sought to be conferred by the Bristow substitute is identical with the power which it was proposed to confer upon the Federal Government at the last session of Congress through the Sutherland amendment, and that that power gives the Federal Government plenary and paramount control over the election of Senators—a control which enables it to supersede and displace the State authority in regard to such elections.

To recapitulate what that power involves, it would give to the Federal Government the power to appoint Federal registrars who should say how the voters or what voters should register under State laws, the power to appoint Federal judges and Federal supervisors who would say who are authorized to vote at such elections, the power to name marshals and deputy marshals to carry out the orders of supervisors and judges, and, if need be, the power to summon the soldiers of this Government to reenforce such marshals and deputy marshals, and the power to appoint a canvassing board to canvass the result of the election. A Senator coming to the Senate would bring a certificate of his election from that canvassing board instead of a commission from the governor of his State.

This power, while existing under section 4 of Article I as to the election of Representatives, as to the election of Senators, is not vested in the Federal Government as it has existed up to this time, and does not arise under any provision of the Constitution except section 4 of Article I, and that has no application to the election of Senators under the Constitution as it stands to-day, and as it has stood since the first adoption of the instrument, because it has never been questioned that the power of Congress under this section, in so far as it affects the election of Senators, relates to such election after the organization of the legislature which elects, and does not go to the booths where the voter registers his will. The contrary contention would find no support either in the decisions of our courts or the debates in Congress.

If Congress has such power then it must be found under some other provision of the Constitution than section 4 of Article I, and the only other such provision is to be found in the second section of the fifteenth amendment, which confers upon Congress the power to enforce it by appropriate legislation. Is the power under this amendment similar to that sought to be conferred by the Bristow substitute? Clearly not, for, in the first place, such power as Congress has under this amendment is not restricted to Federal elections, but extends to all elections, whether State officers or Representatives in Congress. The power conferred by this amendment is wider than that proposed to be conferred by the Bristow substitute, which relates only to the election of Senators. But, on the other hand, it has been many times held that the power under this amendment is only prohibitive and corrective of State action. Before this power can be invoked there must necessarily precede the invoking of it some infringement of the right of the individual based on discrimination against him on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude by the State through its legislative, executive, or judicial department, and no action by individuals, not under color of State authority, will suffice to predicate Federal action on it.

While this proposition is so clearly supported by the decisions of the Supreme Court as apparently not to require any citation of authority, I wish to read a few extracts from the decisions which bear directly on this proposition, because the point which I desire to emphasize is that the power which will exist with section 4 of Article I of the Constitution left unchanged is different and distinct from any power which the Federal Government has had in regard to the election of Senators; that it is absolutely different from the power which the Government has under the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments or under any other provision of the Federal Constitution.

Ex parte Virginia (100 U. S., 339, 346) uses this language, relating to these amendments:

> They have reference to actions of the political body denominated a State, by whatever instrument or in whatever mode that action may be taken. A State acts by its legislative, its executive, or its judicial authorities. It can act in no other way. The constitutional provision, therefore, must mean that no agency of the State or of the officers or agents by whom its powers are exercised, shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. (Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S., 339, 346; 25 L. Ed., 676, 679.)

Again, in United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S., 542, 554; 23 L. Ed., 588, 592), the court uses this language:

> The fourteenth amendment prohibits a State from denying to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; but this provision does not, any more than the one which precedes it and which we have just considered, add anything to the rights which one citizen has under the Constitution against another. The equality of the rights of citizens is the principle of republicanism. Every republican government is in duty bound to protect all its citizens in the enjoyment of this principle if within its power. That duty was originally assumed by the States, and it still remains there. The only obligation resting upon the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right. This the amendment guarantees, but no more. The power of the National Government is limited to the enforcement of this guaranty.

In Civil Rights cases (109 U. S., 3, 13; 27 L. Ed., 835, 840; 3 Sup. Ct. Rept., 18, 22), the court uses this language:

> And so in the present case, until some State law has been passed or some State action, through its officers or agents, has been taken adverse to the rights of citizens sought to be protected by the fourteenth amendment, no legislation of the United States under said amendment, nor any proceeding under such legislation, can be called into activity, for the prohibitions of the amendment are against State laws and acts done under State authority. Of course, legislation may, and should be, provided in advance to meet the exigency when it arises; but it should be adapted to the mischief and wrong which the amendment was intended to provide against; and that is, State laws or State action of some kind adverse to the rights of the citizens secured by the amendment. Such legislation can not properly cover the whole domain of rights appertaining to life, liberty, and property, defining them and providing for their vindication. That would be to establish a code of municipal law regulative of all private rights between man and man in society. It would be to make Congress take the place of the State legislatures and to supersede them. It is absurd to affirm that because the rights of life, liberty, and property (which include all civil rights that men have) are by the amendment sought to be protected against invasion on the part of the State without due process of law, Congress may therefore provide due process of law for their vindication in every case; and that, because of the denial by a State to any persons of the equal protection of the laws is prohibited by the amendment, therefore Congress may establish laws for their equal protection. In fine, the legislation which Congress is authorized to adopt in this behalf is not general legislation upon the rights of the citizens, but corrective legislation; that is, such as may be necessary and proper for counteracting such laws as the States may adopt and enforce and which, by the amendment, they are prohibited from making or enforcing, or such acts and proceedings as the States may commit or take, and which, by the amendment, they are prohibited from committing or taking.

That authority is cited and quoted with approval in James v. Bowman, in One hundred and ninetieth United States—a much later opinion.

Again, in United States v. Harris (106 U. S., 629, 639; 27 L. Ed., 290, 294; 1 Sup. Ct. Rept., 601, 609), the court uses this language:

> The language of the amendment does not leave this subject in doubt. When the State has been guilty of no violation of its provisions; when it has not made or enforced any law abridging the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; when no one of its departments has deprived any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or denied to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; when, on the contrary, the laws of the States, as enacted by its legislative, and construed by its judicial, and administered by its executive, departments, recognize and protect the rights of all persons, the amendment imposes no duty and confers no power upon Congress.

It necessarily follows from the principles laid down in these cases that under the power conferred by the fifteenth amendment Congress can not adopt an election law of its own appointing Federal election officers to supersede and wipe out the machinery of election provided by State laws. The State law must fix the time, manner, and place of election, alone can provide penalties for individual infractions of the ordinary safeguards. Congress can only see that these laws on their face and as administered by the State officers are not unjustly discriminatory, but apply with equal fairness to all. Under the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments Congress has not even the power to punish individuals not claiming any authority from the State, who, by intimidation, prevent persons from voting, though it be done on account of their race, color, or previous condition of servitude. It is only when adverse action is taken by the State or some of its agents that the power of Congress can be invoked to secure the rights conferred by these amendments. This was expressly held in Civil Rights cases (109 U. S., 3):

> In this connection it is proper to state that civil rights, such as are guaranteed by the Constitution against State aggression, can not be impaired by the wrongful act of individuals, unsupported by State authority in the shape of laws, customs, or judicial or executive proceedings. The wrongful act of an individual, unsupported by any such authority, is simply a private wrong, or a crime of that individual; an invasion of the rights of the injured party, it is true, whether they affect his person, his property, or his reputation; but if not sanctioned, in some way by the State or not done under State authority his rights remain in full force, and may presumably be vindicated by resort to the laws of the State for redress. An individual can not deprive a man of his right to vote, to hold property, to buy and sell, to sue in the courts, or to be a witness or a juror; he may, by force or fraud, interfere with the enjoyment of the right in a particular case; he may commit an assault against a person, or commit murder, or use ruffian violence at the polls, or slander the good name of a fellow citizen; but, unless protected in these wrongful acts by some shield of State law or State authority, he can not destroy or injure the right; he will only render himself amenable to satisfaction or punishment; and amenable therefor to the laws of the State where the wrongful acts are committed. Hence, in all those cases where the Constitution seeks to protect the rights of the citizen against discriminative and unjust laws of the State by prohibiting such laws, it is not individual offenses, but obligation and denial of rights which it denounces, and for which it clothes the Congress with power to provide a remedy. This abrogation and denial of rights for which the States alone were or could be responsible, was the great seminal and fundamental wrong which was intended to be remedied. And the remedy to be provided must necessarily be predicated upon that wrong. It must assume that in the cases provided for, the evil or wrong actually committed rests upon some State law or State authority for its excuse and perpetration.

Of course, these remarks do not apply to those cases in which Congress is clothed with direct and plenary powers of legislation over the whole subject, accompanied with an expressed or implied denial of such power to the State, as in the regulation of commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes, the coining of money, the establishment of post offices and post roads, the declaring of war, etc., in these cases Congress has power to pass laws for regulating the subject specified in every detail, and the conduct and transactions of individuals in respect thereof. But where a subject is not submitted to the general legislative power of Congress, but is only submitted thereto for the purpose of rendering effective some prohibition against particular State legislation or State action in reference to that subject, the power given is limited by its object, and any legislation by Congress in the matter must necessarily be corrective in its character, adapted to counteract and redress the operation of such prohibited State laws or proceedings of State officers.

If the principles of interpretation which we have laid down are correct, as we deem them to be (and they are in accord with the principles laid down in the cases before referred to, as well as in the recent case of United States v. Harris, 106 U. S., 629), it is clear that the law in question can not be sustained by any grant of legislative power made to Congress by the fourteenth amendment. That amendment prohibits the States from denying to any person the equal protection of the laws and declares that Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of the amendment. The law in question, without any reference to adverse State legislation on the subject, declares that all persons shall be entitled to equal accommodation and privileges of inns, public conveyances, and places of public amusement, and imposes a penalty upon any individual who shall deny to any citizen such equal accommodations and privileges. This is not corrective legislation; it is primary and direct; it takes immediate and absolute possession of the subject of the right of admission to inns, public conveyances, and places of amusement. It supersedes and displaces State legislation on the same subject, or only allows it permissive force. It ignores such legislation and assumes that the matter is one that belongs to the domain of national regulation whether it would not have been a more effective protection of the rights of citizens to have clothed Congress with plenary powers over the whole subject is not now the question. What we have to decide is whether such plenary power has been conferred upon Congress by the fourteenth amendment, and, in our judgment, it has not.

By virtue of the power proposed to be conferred by the Bristow substitute Congress can take charge of elections and provide for the punishment of individuals unconnected with the State government who commit any of the ordinary offenses against the election laws. It will be seen that in this particular alone a vast difference exists between the power of Congress under these amendments and under the proposed substitute. It is by virtue of the limitation on the power as conferred by these amendments that the suffrage qualifications provided by the constitution of Mississippi and other Southern States are unassailable by the Federal Government, while under the power sought to be conferred by the Bristow substitute instances of individual intimidation might furnish the pretext, or without any pretext Congress might take exclusive charge of the election of Senators.

The difference between the power conferred by the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments and by section 4 of Article I are illustrated in the case of United States v. Reese et al. (92 U. S., 214) and United States v. Munford (16 Fed., 223). In the former case the prosecution was undertaken against two of the inspectors of a municipal election in the State of Kentucky for refusing to receive and count at such election the vote of a citizen of African descent, under the act of May 31, 1870.

For the punishment of any person who shall, by force, bribery, threats, intimidation, or other unlawful means, hinder, delay, etc., or shall conspire with others to hinder, delay, prevent, or obstruct any citizen from doing any act required to be done to qualify him to vote or from voting at any election.

The court held that the power could not be upheld under section 4 of Article I, because it did not relate to the election of a Representative, and that it could not be upheld under the fifteenth amendment because it was not in its terms confined to unlawful discrimination on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and therefore the act was unconstitutional.

In the Munford case the offense was committed at an election for Representative in Congress, and the court held that the statute was a valid exercise of power under section 4 of Article I of the Constitution. So the statute which was condemned as beyond the power of Congress under the fifteenth amendment was upheld under the power conferred by section 4 of Article I.

In my judgment, these decisions are neither modified nor overruled by the Seibold case, One hundredth United States, nor the frequently quoted Yarborough case, in One hundred and tenth United States. The Seibold case arose under the Federal supervision laws, and the sole question involved was whether Congress could under these laws take partial control of the election instead of exclusive control, and having taken such partial control could punish the State officers for violation of the law. The court answered the question in the affirmative. The indictment was for ballot-box stuffing.

The Yarborough case was a habeas corpus case, and the sole question was whether the law of Congress under which the parties were indicted was unconstitutional, they being charged with the offense of intimidating a negro in voting for a Member of Congress. While the language used by the court was broad, it did not purport to overrule its previous decisions, and the constitutionality of the law was, in fact, upheld upon the Seibold case and under section 4 of Article I.

The fifth subdivision of the minority report is subject to the criticism of disingenuousness. It says:

Possession of the power which it is proposed to strike out from section 4 is essential to enable the National Government to act effectively in case it should ever have occasion to enforce the provisions of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments of the Constitution. The basis of any enforcement of these provisions must necessarily be the ascertainment and establishment of the facts in respect of the elections to which they may relate. The proposed amendment of section 4 of Article I, if adopted, would be the latest expression of the sovereign will of the people of the United States, and would take away from the National Government authority to make those regulations regarding elections which are essential to the preservation of evidence regarding what actually occurs.

The fourteenth and fifteenth amendments confer upon Congress the power to provide for their enforcement by appropriate legislation, and no additional power is needed to make them effective. As a matter of fact, the adoption of the Bristow substitute would have no possible effect upon the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, except in so far as they might apply to the narrow field of election of Senators. These amendments relate to all elections, and it is, to say the least, inaccurate to assert that the Bristow substitute, which relates only to the election of Senators, is necessary to make them effective. If they are ineffective now, they will not be made effective in this way except as to the election of Senators, to which they now have no real relation. What is, in fact, meant by the argument of the minority of the committee is that the effect of the Bristow substitute, in so far as senatorial elections are concerned, while not needed to make these amendments effective, will greatly extend their application beyond what was ever intended at the time of their adoption. The minority doubtless had in their mind that with the Bristow substitute adopted Congress could create election machinery of its own and, among other things, provide penalties against individuals not connected with the State who, by intimidation or otherwise, sought to deny the right of suffrage by reason of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. In other words, while the amendments are only corrective and prohibitory and relate only to State action, the power conferred by the Bristow substitute is direct and primary, and could be made the means of extending the prohibition of these amendments far beyond what was intended by their authors.

The real purpose is not to make these amendments effective, but at this late day to extend the operation of them in a vital particular. Under the guise of making them effective a fundamental and revolutionary change is suggested of making their subject matter extend not only to State action as at present, but to the action of individuals as well, and to permit their enforcement by direct and primary instead of corrective and prohibitory legislation. There is no merit in the contention of the minority that this latest expression of the sovereign will of the people would take away from the National Government authority to make these regulations regarding elections which are essential to the preservation of evidence regarding what actually occurs. This statement is intended to relate to the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments. Congress now has the power to enforce these amendments by appropriate legislation, and the proposed amendment would leave the power to so enforce them by appropriate legislation absolutely unimpaired.

The minority report continues—

There may be a difference of opinion as to whether the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments should remain in the Constitution, but surely it can not be thought consistent with the dignity and honor of the United States to leave them in the Constitution and at the same time surrender the power which would be necessary for their enforcement.

What would be surrendered by the resolution as reported? Every prohibition of both amendments would remain just as at present, while the power conferred on Congress to enforce them by appropriate legislation would remain and would be construed and interpreted exactly as at present. No power now existing or justifiable under these amendments would be surrendered. The only thing surrendered would be the power of Congress to fix or change the time or manner of holding elections for Senators. While the amendment as originally reported does not call for the surrender of any power to enforce these amendments, the Bristow substitute, if adopted, would have the effect of changing and extending their scope, and that is the question involved.

That Republicans should favor this substitute is not surprising. It involves an extension of the power of the Federal Government at the expense of State sovereignty, and for such extension that party has always stood. But that Democrats should support that doctrine has not the merit of consistency. When the force bill of 1890 passed the House of Representatives it received 155 Republican votes—not a Democratic vote—while 146 Democrats voted against it and only 3 Republicans, and they from the States of Louisiana, South Carolina, and New Jersey.

In 1894, when the Federal supervision laws were repealed, every Democrat in the House—194 of them—voted for the repeal, and every Republican—102 of them—against the repeal; and in the Senate every Democrat (35) voted for the repeal, and every Republican (28), including several who are now members of this body, against this repeal, except Stewart of Nevada.

At the last session of Congress every Democrat in the Senate except one voted against the Sutherland amendment and every regular Republican for it.

Why should Democrats now vote for a change in the organic law of the Government in the form which they have, by their recorded vote, disapproved of, and this, when the form approved of was reported favorably by a Republican committee, and why, especially, should they do this at a time when every Democrat believes that within two years, by a Democratic majority in the Senate, they can frame the resolution in the form approved of by themselves? The State legislatures have no power to change a word of the resolution. They must accept it or reject it as offered. For 122 years we have lived under the Constitution as it now stands. Is it not better to await a few years in order to change it in the manner approved of by our judgment?

When this resolution, then known as the Sutherland amendment, was before the last Congress eight insurgent Republican Senators voted against it. That vote to-day would defeat it, but rumor says this vote will show changes. What is the explanation of such changes by men of unusual ability and sincere convictions? Is the rumor that insurgents are becoming more gentle and less disposed to harass the ranks of the regulars the explanation, or is it because the honor of introducing the resolution at this session is accorded one of the insurgent band, or is it because the voice of the old soldier has been heard protesting against an imaginary impairing of the war amendments, esteemed by them to be the fruits of their struggle, or is the prophecy so recently made by the distinguished ex-Senator from New York that the Republicans, if they did not insist upon this extension of power to the Federal Government, would feel the heavy displeasure of the negro vote, been so quickly realized? Have one or all of these reasons tended to bring about this significant change in the votes of these Republican Senators?

If so, do one or all of them furnish any reason for the support of the substitute by Democratic Senators?

It has been strenuously urged that the substitute is necessary in order to insure the perpetuation of the Union. In no clause of the Constitution has Congress ever had the power to force a State to elect a Senator. Is there any danger that States will refuse to elect Senators in the future, or is the danger that men can not be found to serve as Senators? One danger is just as real as the other, and both too fanciful to merit consideration. Certainly there is greater danger that Congress, yielding to the exigencies of some political demand, may exercise in the future the power sought to be conferred upon it and take charge of elections than there is that such power will ever be needed in order to insure the election of Senators.

While this substitute must be obnoxious to every Democrat in the form in which it is offered, owing to the unfortunate conditions of the Southern States, it is necessarily more fraught with danger to them. While it may be true that immigration to some of the Southern States has reduced the gravity of the negro problem, yet it can not be true that this change has made Senators from those States deaf to the appeals of their brethren from less fortunate States, and it is only by a Democratic vote that this substitute can be adopted. Even admitting that the substitute is needed to make the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments more effective, does that furnish a reason for Democrats voting for the substitute? These amendments we have accepted, and under them have wrought out constitutions which have been stamped with the approval of the highest court in the land. Is it wise by our votes to change the operation of these amendments, rendering them more effective and probably embarking upon an uncertain sea of judicial construction? There is no advantage offered which compensates for the risk incurred.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President, I am so very anxious that we shall take a vote upon this measure that I shall consume not more than one minute in what I shall have to say.

I, like my colleague, did not expect to say anything upon this occasion, but he has presented an argument to the Senate, if his figures be correct, why this measure should become a part of the organic law of the land, because, if the legislatures of the country do not properly define the legislative districts and thus give the people proper representation, the greater the reason why Senators should be elected by a direct vote of the people.

I am not here for the purpose of defending a legislature or legislatures which do not make fair apportionments. If I did, it would take perhaps the balance of this session, because there is not a State in the Union, perhaps, that has not made legislative, judicial, senatorial, and congressional districts which are unfair in the manner of the assignments.

I do not think Kentucky stands alone, if it be as suggested by my colleague.

But I owe it to the Legislature of Kentucky to make this suggestion, which might apply to the legislatures in some other States. Take the State of Kentucky. There has been wonderful development in the mountainous part of the State. The eleventh congressional district is filled with rich coal mines. Considerable cities have grown up there in the last few years. Middlesboro is a city of many thousands of people. You take Somerset, which is another city that has grown up into its present proportions in the last few years. So a part at least of the vote in some of these senatorial districts may be accounted for upon the idea that there has been an accession to the population in the last few years. That may not, and I do not say that it does, account for all of it, because if I did I would place the Legislature of Kentucky upon a higher plane, perhaps, than any legislature in this country could be placed with reference to the question of apportioning the territory into districts.

There is another view that may be suggested. There are some parts of Kentucky in which the population has decreased instead of increased. That would account to some extent for the smallness of population in some of these legislative and senatorial districts. I say that that may not account for all of it, but it does account for some of it.

My colleague has suggested that the Court of Appeals of Kentucky said it was the duty of the legislature to reapportion the State into these various districts. If the court did do it, and I think it did, it was a mere dictum, because the court can only review the action of the legislature to determine whether or not it has acted within constitutional limitations. It has no power to enforce a redistricting of the State, and therefore what is the duty of the legislature as to present or future action with reference to that matter is not within the province of the court to prescribe for, because, as I say, it can only review the action of the legislature when it has acted upon these questions.

Further, I want to make another suggestion. Our constitution provides that these apportionments shall be made every 10 years. My colleague has said that the legislature did act. I have not the dates in my mind; I do not recall just when it was; but if it acts, for instance, at the period provided by the constitution, and the court declares that the action of the legislature is invalid, then the question arises, has the legislature power to make an apportionment until the expiration of the next 10 years? I do not suggest that that is a proper view of it, but it is a view that addresses itself to the legislative branch of the Government, which it must determine for itself without the aid of the court.

That is all I desire to say.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, the figures which I read to the Senate were the census figures of 1910. It is true that these figures differ from the figures of preceding censuses, because there has been in the Republican portion of the State great advancement, but the same proportion substantially will be found to exist under the former census. Indeed, the difference is even more radical.

I now desire to call the attention of the Senate to what the Court of Appeals of Kentucky said under the census preceding this.

In 1906 an act was passed redistricting the State. More than 10 years had elapsed from the date of making former apportionment—1893—before that act was passed, and, notwithstanding it was the duty of the legislature, under the constitution of Kentucky, to redistrict the State every 10 years, it refused persistently to do it. But in 1906 it enacted an apportionment bill, and that bill was passed on by the Court of Appeals of Kentucky.

I desire to read to the Senate what the court of appeals said of conditions under the census of 1909.

Without analyzing the allegations of the petitions with overnice particularity, it is deemed sufficient to say that, in our opinion, they contain such a statement of facts with reference to the inequality of the representative districts of the State that the demurrers, which confess these allegations, raise sufficiently for adjudication the validity of the act which is assailed. The allegations upon which is predicated the infirmity of the act are substantially the same in both petitions. General demurrers were filed to each of them and overruled by the trial courts. The defendants declined to answer, and thereupon judgments were entered holding the act of the general assembly under discussion invalid and perpetuating the temporary injunctions which had been granted at the commencement of the actions. From these judgments the defendants have appealed. (Ragland v. Anderson, 125 Ky. Repts., p. 150.)

The court, after quoting section 33 of the constitution of Kentucky, requiring these divisions to be made every 10 years, says:

The first proposition with which we are confronted is raised by the insistence of appellants, that the question involved here is political and not judicial. (Ragland v. Anderson, 125 Ky. Repts., p. 151.)

I will not read further, but will remark that they decided it was a judicial question. I want to come to the facts of this case, as recited by the court, to show how much more glaring the outrages are than those which I cited a few moments ago for the purpose of proving that the census of 1900 does not palliate, but enlarges them.

Continuing, the court says (p. 154):

That the act under discussion is grossly violative of section 33 of the Constitution, in that the injunction as to equality between the districts was not even pretended to be obeyed by the legislature, is not and can not be denied. The material allegations of the petitions are admitted by the demurrers, and we have, therefore, before us a redistricting act in which 12 Democratic counties—the population of the largest of which is 12,137, and the smallest, 7,407—are each given a representative. The population of Kentucky, according to the census of 1900, was 2,147,174. This, divided by 100—the number of representative districts—produces as the average unit for representation the sum of 21,471. Tested by this ratio, some of the counties which are each given a representative have a population of less than one-half the unit of representation, and the rest have little more than one-half. On the other hand, there are 12 Republican districts composed in large part of two and three counties each, the smallest of which districts has a population of 30,615 and the largest 53,263, which are only given one representative each. The first 12 districts, composed of one county each, have an aggregate population of 124,933, while the aggregate population of the second 12 districts is 466,451. The first 12 districts were entitled to only 6 representatives, tested by the average ratio, but were given 12. The second 12 districts were entitled to 22 representatives, but were only given 12. To take the extremes, Spencer County—which belongs to the first set—has a population of only 7,407 and is given one representative, whereas Ohio, Butler, and Edmonson, which compose the twenty-sixth district under the act in question, have a total population of 53,262, and these together have only one representative. In other words, a voter in Spencer County exercises in the legislature of the State more than seven times the influence of a voter in Ohio, Butler, and Edmonson Counties.

And be it remembered the negro question does not figure in those counties. These were white voters almost entirely.

Continuing, the court says (p. 155)—

This inequality is so glaring that it precludes the possibility that there was any attempt on the part of the legislature to apportion the State into 100 representative districts as nearly equal in population or area as might be.

It needs no argument or elaboration to show that the arrangement of the districts for representation is clearly violative of the constitutional inhibition against inequality.

The court says there was not even any attempt upon the part of the legislature to conform to this constitutional duty, and hence I say I am unwilling that such legislatures shall control the election of a United States Senator.

Now, let us go a little further. Says the court, in more eloquent words than I can employ—

Section 1 of the bill of rights provides: "All men are by nature free and equal. * * *" Section 3: "All men, when they form a social compact, are equal. * * *" Section 33 provides for equality of representation. Sections 171, 172, 173, and 174 provide for equality of taxation (uniformity). Section 39 provides for equality (general) of laws. Indeed, it could not be otherwise, for when our forefathers emigrated from their European home it was, in the main, to escape from the oppression of inequality. They brought with them a burning love for this great democratic principle and imbedded it deep in the foundation of the empire they were destined to erect, and which they will preserve so long as the love of liberty is more than a name. When they threw off the supervising government of the mother country, it was because they were denied equality of representation, or, as they then expressed the evil, they had imposed upon them taxation without representation.

Equality of representation is a vital principle of democracy. In proportion as this is denied or withheld, the government becomes oligarchical or monarchical. Without equality republican institutions are impossible. Inequality of representation is a tyranny to which no people worthy of freedom will tamely submit. To say that a man in Spencer County shall have seven times as much influence in the government of the State as a man in Ohio, Butler, or Edmonson is to say that six men out of every seven in those counties are not represented in the government at all. They are required to submit to taxation without representation. It was this kind of oppression which inspired that great struggle for freedom which began on Lexington Green in 1775 and ended at Yorktown in 1781. Equality of representation is the basis of patriotism. No citizen will, or ought to, love the State which oppresses him, and that citizen is arbitrarily oppressed who is denied equality of representation with every other citizen of the Commonwealth. It is no answer to the demand of appellees that the act of 1906 be declared unconstitutional to say that it will follow that the act of 1893 must also be declared unconstitutional, because it created unequal representative districts, although in a less degree than that of 1906. The conclusion sought to be drawn does not follow. The act of 1893 has gone into effect and the Government has been organized under it. To hold it void would be to throw the Government into chaos; and this no court is required to do. It is now too late to question its validity. (Ragland v. Anderson, 125 Kentucky Repts., pp. 160, 161.)

The court then proceeded to hold that act unconstitutional. In the other case to which I referred, which my distinguished colleague says is merely a dictum of the court, the court was asked to declare the act of 1893 unconstitutional.

Mr. PAYNTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to his colleague?

Mr. BRADLEY. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNTER. I think my colleague misapprehended what I said. I said in so far as the court expressed an opinion as to whether the legislature should act, it was dictum; that it was only competent for the court to review the action of the State legislature to determine the validity of the act in question.

Mr. BRADLEY. I do not think I misunderstood my colleague. I understood him to say just what he has said now, but I am coming to that proposition.

Here is another opinion of the court. The first opinion will be found in 125 Kentucky. The one from which I now read is in 126 Kentucky. This was an action attempting to have the act of 1893 held unconstitutional. The court said:

We do not deem it necessary to write an elaborate opinion in this case, but will virtually content ourselves with restating and adopting a portion of the opinion of this court in Ragland v. Anderson (100 S. W., 865; 125 Ky., 141; 30 Ky. Law Rep., 1199), handed down on March 20, 1907, in which opinion the court, after holding the act of March, 1906, redistricting the State into representative districts, void, said: "It is no answer to the demand of appellees that the act of 1906 be declared unconstitutional that it will follow that the act of 1893 must also be declared unconstitutional, because it created unequal representative districts, although in a less degree than that of 1906. The conclusion sought to be drawn does not follow. The act of 1893 has gone into effect, and the government has been organized under it. To hold it void would be to throw the government into chaos, and this no court is required to do. It is now too late to question its validity. The next legislature must be elected under it. (Kentucky Reports, vol. 126, April term, 1907, Adams, etc., v. Bosworth, pp. 63, 64.)

Now comes the dictum of the court; but nevertheless, whether a dictum or not, a direct warning and instruction to the legislature:

The next legislature must be elected under it, and then we have no doubt the members, impelled by their sense of duty and the obligations of their oath of office, together with that spirit of justice which is the heritage of the race, will redistrict the State as the constitution requires (p. 64).

But, notwithstanding this terrific arraignment by the court of appeals, notwithstanding its expression of hope that the Legislature of Kentucky would comply with the constitution under their oaths, the legislature met and refused to redistrict the State.

It is no answer to say that the same sort of conduct might have happened in some other States. We are asked here to deprive ourselves of the supervisory right that we have over the election of Senators, and to turn it over to the legislatures of the States, and if the legislatures of States, Kentucky and others, disregard and trample under foot the sacred precepts of the State constitutions, what right have we to expect any better or different treatment when the time, place, and manner of electing Senators is turned over to them entirely and this Senate deprived of all of its rights?

I am willing to trust the people, yes; God bless the people. After they think and deliberate I am always willing to trust them, but I am not at all times willing to trust representative bodies, and certainly not when they persist in an open, bold, and defiant violation of the constitution of the State and their oaths as well. Disregarding the injunction of the highest court of the State it still continues its bold violation of the constitution, and denies to the people of Kentucky that equality of representation to which they are entitled under the constitution of the State.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the difference between the Bristow amendment and the Borah resolution is this: The Borah resolution provides that the time, place, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof. The Bristow amendment strikes that provision out. The Borah resolution proposes to leave this question to the State. The Bristow amendment proposes to leave it as it stands in the Constitution, substantially with the provision, in effect, that if the Congress of the United States sees fit to exercise its control over the time, place, and manner of electing Senators it may exercise that right.

It is for this reason that I am opposed to the Bristow amendment. I desire every State in the Union, and particularly the State of Oklahoma, to exercise absolute control over its own elections, without any interference whatever on the part of the Federal Government. I believe that this system will be approved by every State in the Union.

I can not at all agree with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] that if this matter is presented to the States of the Union over a fourth of the States in this Republic would be willing and would prefer to divest themselves of the right of determining the "time, place, and manner" of their own elections of Senators. He fears the defeat of the Borah resolution by over a fourth of the States opposing it on this ground. What Senator on this floor is willing to arise and say that his State desires to divest itself of this right of fixing the time, place, and manner of electing Senators and give that right to the Federal Government?

I do not favor the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas giving the Federal Government the right of controlling the election of Senators in the several States, for the very reason that, as it will require three-fourths of the States of the Union to make effective this proposed amendment, and as it requires only 12 States to defeat it, his amendment will put the whole proposition in jeopardy. We have heard from representatives of the Southern States their apprehension with regard to this matter. I do not agree with the reality of the danger, but I do agree with them in recognizing the fact that they do fear, on account of the previous experience with the Lodge force bill, and that they will not expect the approval of their own States if they vote for the Bristow amendment, and therefore that we are in danger of losing a number of the States in the South if we send out the Bristow form to be voted on. It would require only a few others besides the Southern States to defeat this measure before the country. Probably 7 Southern States might reject the Bristow amendment, and if the special interests could line up 5 Northern States against the proposed amendment, the constitutional amendment would be defeated.

I favor the Borah resolution above all other things because it not only gives the people the right to select their own Senators by direct vote, but for the further and greater reason that it is a long and substantial step toward making democratic the Constitution of the United States—and I use that term most advisedly, because I say that the Constitution of the United States is not thoroughly democratic. The Constitution of the United States was so drawn by Madison and those who were in the Constitutional Convention as to allow an unfair power to vest in the hands of the minority, and this principle shows from one end of the Constitution to the other. The Constitution of the United States is not and was not then (1789) in accord with the democratic constitutions of the various States as they existed at the time of the making of the Constitution of the United States.

One of the great differences which I will call the attention of the Senate to—and I am not going to detain the Senate long—is in the matter of the judiciary. Hamilton made the argument that the Federal judiciary ought to be appointed for life, and he made the argument and backed it up with a fallacious theory, which seems to have been quite generally acquiesced in by those who have written upon this subject. He based his argument for a life judiciary upon the theory that this would be in substantial accord with the English system when, in point of fact, it was nothing of the kind. It is true, in the English system the judges were appointed for life, but it is also true that the right of recall of the English judges was provided for by memorial or resolution or address of the Parliament of Great Britain as far back as 1688. The judiciary of Great Britain does not legislate nor declare acts of Parliament null and void. It is responsible to Parliament and not an entirely independent and irresponsible power.

There is no recall for the Supreme Court of the United States, as in Great Britain, and on some more suitable and convenient occasion I will undertake to present to the Senate the reasons why I think it unwise to have a judiciary entirely independent of Congress and of the great public opinion of the United States. I do not believe in nine men, no matter who they are, being put in a position where they can disregard the will of the people of the United States and of their representatives in Congress with comparative impunity. It is one of the ways in which the right of the majority to control this country is denied; it is one of the ways in which the Constitution of the United States was made undemocratic.

We talk about the right of recall of judges as if it were a new, strange, and unwise doctrine. I call your attention to the fact that the majority of the States of the Union at the time of the establishment of the Constitution of the United States had the right of recall of their judges.

The legislature, indeed, being the direct representative of the people, in many instances chose the judiciary, as in Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, New York, and Delaware, and it was not regarded as unreasonable by our forefathers that the legislature should recall judges, as the Parliament did in England, and this was actually done by the executive on an address of both branches of the legislature in many of the States, as in Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Maryland, Delaware, South Carolina, and Pennsylvania.

In Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Georgia judges were elected only for one year, and were thus automatically recalled by this exceedingly short tenure.

In eight States—Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New York, Delaware, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia—the term of office of judges was during good behavior.

Restoring the active right of recall of judges will go far toward making democratic the Constitution of the United States, and for that reason I strongly favor it. When Congress or the people have a legal right to recall judges, the judges will respect public opinion and the general welfare. They will not set aside State or Federal laws, nor legislate under color of judicial decisions, and they will so conduct themselves that the use of the recall will be unnecessary.

The undemocratic character of the Constitution of the United States is shown in the extreme difficulty the people have in changing the Constitution in any particular. For example, in changing the Constitution so as to permit the election of Senators by direct vote, one vote in excess of a third of the votes of the House of Representatives can block this amendment of the Constitution. In like manner a fraction over a third of the votes in the Senate can defeat this amendment to the Constitution; and if both these hurdles be passed, a fraction over one-fourth of the States can defeat the will of nearly three-fourths of the States. And of the 36 States necessary to amend the Constitution, any one of the 36 governors might, by an arbitrary veto or even by corrupt influence, block the will of the American people; or any one of the 36 legislatures might be obstructed by a majority in any one of the 36 senates or of the 36 houses.

It is thus obvious that a line of obstacles has been interposed, in the framing of the Constitution of the United States, to prevent the will of the majority of the people of the United States from controlling the laws of this country, thus giving an unfair veto power into the hands of the minority.

We preach in this country, as a democratic doctrine, the right of the majority to rule. We have permitted our hands, nevertheless, to be tied by an undemocratic Constitution, where a minority actually rules. We do not allow the majority of the people or of the States to rule or to change the Constitution. Nine-tenths of the people of the United States have desired the election of Senators by direct vote of the people, and they have been trying to obtain their wish for a hundred years in vain. The majority is controlled by the minority, and the Constitution which does this is glorified and proclaimed as a perfect instrument of democracy. We should make democratic the Constitution and provide for the majority rule.

The people are denied the right to choose their own Senators under this Constitution, which was so framed as to make easy the corrupt election of Senators. It was so framed—not by intent but by its mechanism—as to permit senatorships to be bought with comparative ease and safety; it was so framed—not by intent but by its mechanism—as to permit corruption and successful rascality.

And all the special interests in the country are now opposed to the change and praise the Constitution as a sacred instrument, so sacred that to suggest its improvement or amendment is denounced as sacrilege. Fortunately, however, the great Democratic Party, and every other party except the Republican Party, has gone on record in favor of this particular reform.

Now, Mr. President, I want to place in the RECORD the grossly undemocratic attitude of the Republican national party machine on this question of the direct election of Senators. I made reference to it when the Senator from Missouri was speaking. But first I will present the democratic attitude of what may be called the Progressive Republicans of the United States on this question. The minority report of COOPER, of Wiscousin, on this matter before the Republican national convention in Chicago in 1908 is very short and goes to the heart of this question.

His minority report from the committee on resolutions is as follows:

ELECTIONS OF UNITED STATES SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

The people of this country demand that government shall be truly representative. The legislatures of 27 States, 19 of them represented by Republican Senators in the United States Senate, have adopted joint resolutions favoring a constitutional amendment for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people. The House of Representatives has five times, the last time by unanimous vote, adopted and transmitted to the Senate a resolution proposing such a constitutional amendment. The Senate refuses to permit a vote upon the passage of such a resolution. Washington declared in his Farewell Address that: "The basis of our political system is the right of the people to make and alter their constitutions of government." To deny or withhold that right is destructive of the basic principle of a republican form of government. Believing with Abraham Lincoln that this should be in truth a "Government of the people, by the people, for the people" we demand that Congress shall, upon the convening of the next session, propose for the ratification of the legislatures of the several States an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people.

That was the voice of the progressive Republicans in the Republican national convention of 1908, and, in my judgment, the progressive Republican citizens and voters number nearly, if not more than, half of the Republican voters in the United States.

Now, listen to the undemocratic machine voice of the "regular Republicans," through Mr. Albert J. Hopkins, of Illinois, chairman of the committee on resolutions:

Gentlemen of the convention—

Says he, and he is speaking with regard to these proposals of the progressive Republicans, favoring the "direct election of Senators," "the physical valuation of railways," "control of the trusts," "reducing the tariff," "publicity of campaign contributions and expenditures," "regulation of telegraph and telephone rates," "against ship subsidies," "against government by injunction," "in favor of trial in contempt cases," "in favor of a department of labor," and "protection to employees" and the "eight-hour law," as submitted by the minority report of Mr. HENRY ALLEN COOPER—he is speaking for the Republican machine as its authorized mouthpiece:

I am not going to make a speech—

Says Mr. Hopkins—

I desire to call your attention to the fact that this convention selected 53 members from the body of the convention, one from each delegation, to prepare a declaration of principles. The report that I have read to this convention embodies the work of 52 of the 53 members of that committee. [Applause.] In our deliberations every plank that has been offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin was considered by the committee. Everything that is Republican in any one of those planks is already adopted in the majority report. [Applause.]—

The election of Senators was not in the majority report nor were the other progressive principles registered there, which I have enumerated—

We rejected in those planks that have been offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin the doctrines of socialism embodied in them. [Applause.] Now, gentlemen, the question for you to determine is whether you will stand by the report of the majority or whether you will take the Socialist-Democratic utterances of Wisconsin. [Applause.]

Not only were the reasonable demands of the progressive Republicans rejected in every particular, but subjected to epithets intended to be insulting. And thereupon the machine voted and rejected the proposal favoring the election of Senators by direct vote (866 nays to 114 yeas), as follows:

States, Territories, etc.	Number of votes in convention.	Yeas.	Nays.

The machine in control of the Republican convention in like manner voted down the minority report of HENRY ALLEN COOPER, of Wisconsin, in favor of the physical valuations of railways as a basis of controlling the rates. In like manner it voted down the positive pledge for the revision of the tariff "by the imposition of such duties only as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad" and "the admission free of articles controlled by the trusts, subject to the difference in labor cost," and for "a permanent tariff commission."

In like manner the machine voted down the progressive antitrust plank with the penalty of imprisonment of those who violate the antitrust law.

In like manner the machine voted down the plank providing for the publicity of campaign contributions and expenditures.

In like manner the machine voted down the plank opposing ship subsidy. In like manner the machine voted down the regulation of telegraph and telephone rates.

In like manner the machine voted down the plank regulating injunctions and pledging trials in contempt cases.

In like manner the machine voted down the plank favoring a department of labor. In like manner the machine voted down the plank favoring protection to employees by a general employers' liability act for injury to the body or loss of life of its employees. (P. 125, Fourteenth Republican National Convention, Chicago, 1908.)

THE REPUBLICAN MACHINE.

And, Mr. President, what is the source of the power of the political machine which controlled the Republican national convention of 1908? Where do its votes come from?

From the Southern States, which give no Republican electoral votes, we had the following:

Alabama	22	North Carolina	24
Arkansas	18	Oklahoma	14
Florida	10	South Carolina	18
Georgia	26	Tennessee	24
Louisiana	18	Texas	36
Kentucky	26	Virginia	24

It requires only 491 votes to make a majority, and of these 334 votes came from Southern States, leaving only 157 votes to be obtained outside of the Southern States to control the national convention, and the southern delegates can be and are believed to be controlled by patronage.

But even in those States which do give Republican electoral votes, such as Pennsylvania, New York, Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, there is a well-recognized system of machine politics that does not in reality give the people of those States an opportunity to elect under any safeguards their own delegates to such conventions.

Yes, Mr. President, the machine voted down all these progressive policies, and the American people are thus governed by an irresponsible set of machine-made delegates, whose selection and subsequent conduct is guided by the special interests secretly, by processes almost occult in operation, but efficient and powerful in results, nominating the President and Vice President, and declaring policies of government the people are compelled to swallow.

Mr. President, where did these delegates come from who nominated the President and the Vice President, who determined our national policies by the declarations of the Republican national platform, who voted down the progressive Republican proposals offered by COOPER's minority report and sustained the stand-pat policies?

Mr. President, they were delegated from State conventions. The State conventions were composed of delegates delegated from county conventions. The county conventions were composed of delegates delegated from precinct and ward caucuses, and the ward caucus was probably called by a petty ward boss on short notice, by obscure advertisement, in some undesirable room, packed with ward heelers, who represented the ward boss and his petty local machine. The ward caucus probably delegated the ward boss and one or two of his henchmen to the county convention and the county convention, composed of such disinterested and upright patriots, such delegated delegates, sent their most vigorous representatives of this order of statecraft the delegates of delegated delegates to the State convention, composed of delegated delegates of delegated delegates of the third degree, where the process of the "survival of the fittest" went on, sending to the national Republican convention a majority of its members composed of picked machine politicians, many of them mercenaries engaged in the governing business for profit, and most of them the political allies of big business. These are the gentlemen who will include in their number every political boss conspicuous in the several States and conspicuous in the big cities. They are "practical" politicians, who know how to "fry the fat" out of corporations. They are the distinguished citizens who make secret deals with big municipal contractors, who contribute substantial sums of money "for the success of the party" and incidentally receive larger sums of money at the expense of the public out of municipal contracts when the party gets in the governing business. They are the distinguished citizens who manipulate State legislatures and incidentally stand in with "big business" and receive large campaign funds "for the success of the party" and incidentally control nominations of Presidents and the choosing of Senators and indirectly control the choice of prosecuting attorneys and influence them in their prosecution (?) of the trusts. These are the gentlemen who undertake to engineer and nominate judges on the bench, for they are in the governing business and they like to see the administration of the law in the hands of their friends, whether in the legislative or executive offices or on the bench.

What wonder is it that they are opposed to the publicity of campaign contributions and the election of Senators by direct vote? What wonder is it that they oppose physical valuation of railroads, employers' liability acts, and regulations of telegraph and telephone rates, and the control of rates, and the reduction of the tariff, as proposed by COOPER and overwhelmingly voted down by the machine?

The machine thus writes our political policies through the operation of a political party and places its controlling hand upon the officials of this Government who hold office under constitutional forms, but by machine nomination. The machine appoints a committee of 53 men, who are responsible to no constituency, on the committee on resolutions to write our national policies. Did they truly represent the 17 Republican States who, through their legislatures, demanded the direct election of Senators? Did they fairly represent the people of Pennsylvania, who, through their legislature, demanded this reform, or the people of Indiana, or the people of Michigan, or of Wisconsin, or of Minnesota, or of Iowa, or of Illinois, or of any of the Western States who had declared for the direct election of Senators? They did not. They did not truly represent the people. They were not elected by the people, but nominated and appointed by ward caucuses, machine-made county and State conventions. They represented a machine, in my opinion, unduly influenced or controlled by the special interests of this country. That is what they really represented in their recorded acts. They did not represent the Republican voters of this country when they voted down the Cooper minority report, and they did represent the special interests.

For one citizen of the United States, I am tired of machine government of this country. I am weary of seeing corrupt special interests put their hands secretly upon the governing function in towns, in cities, in States, and in the Nation through this system of machine politics, where representative government has very nearly met its destruction. Fortunately, due to the intelligence and patriotism of this country, to which we owe thanks, there has grown up in this country in both parties a wide movement, not partisan, but thoroughly patriotic, having for its purpose to put commercialism out of the governing business in this country, so that when Gov. Johnson, a Republican candidate for governor of California, for example, made his great campaign there he had as his slogan, "The Southern Pacific has got to go out of the governing business in California," and on that issue he won. In other States on like issues one victory after another has been snatched from the commercialized machines.

I call the attention of the Senate to the record of the vote on the election of Senators by direct vote of the people in the last session of Congress. On the Sutherland amendment retaining Federal control over "the time, place, and manner" of electing Senators there were 50 ayes, 37 nays. On the Borah resolution thus amended by the Sutherland amendment there were 54 yeas and 33 nays. For the Sutherland amendment there were 49 Republicans and 1 Democrat; and of those 49 Republicans 24 of them were against the election of Senators on any basis, showing that 24 Senators who desired to defeat the reform supported the Sutherland amendment, which is the same as the Bristow amendment, substantially.

I call the attention of Senators also to the fact that since we must judge the future by the past, they would do well to observe that 10 Senators who were against this reform did not return on the 4th of March last—to wit, Aldrich, Bulkeley, Elkins, Burrows, Depew, Dick, Flint, Hale, Kean, Scott—and that nearly every Senator who has shown his lack of sympathy with popular government recently has been defeated by the people as far as the people have been able to express themselves in choosing the successors of such Senators.

It is well enough to consider what the people of this country think; public opinion ought not to be disregarded by Senators who care to prolong their usefulness as public servants.

The vote on the Sutherland amendment was as follows:

Yeas—Beveridge, Bradley, Brandegee, Briggs, Bulkeley, Burkett, Burnham, Burrows, Burton, Carter, Clark of Wyoming, Clarke of Arkansas, Crane, Crawford, Cullom, Curtis, Depew, Dick, Dillingham, Dixon, du Pont, Flint, Frye, Gallinger, Gamble, Guggenheim, Hale, Heyburn, Jones, Kean, Lodge, Lorimer, McCumber, Nelson, Nixon, Oliver, Page, Penrose, Perkins, Piles, Richardson, Root, Scott, Smith of Michigan, Smoot, Stephenson, Sutherland, Warner, Wetmore, and Young—50.

Nays—Bacon, Bailey, Bankhead, Borah, Bourne, Bristow, Brown, Chamberlain, Clapp, Culberson, Cummins, Davis, Fletcher, Foster, Frazier, Gore, Gronna, Johnston, La Follette, Martin, Newlands, Overman, Owen, Paynter, Percy, Rayner, Shively, Simmons, Smith of Maryland, Smith of South Carolina, Stone, Swanson, Taliaferro, Taylor, Thornton, Tillman, and Watson—37.

Not voting—Aldrich, Money, Terrell, and Warren—4.

So Mr. SUTHERLAND's amendment was agreed to.

Vote on the Borah resolution was as follows:

Yeas: Bailey, Beveridge, Borah, Bourne, Bradley, Briggs, Bristow, Brown, Burkett, Burton, Carter, Chamberlain, Clapp, Clark of Wyoming, Clarke of Arkansas, Culberson, Cullom, Cummins, Curtis, Davis, Dixon, du Pont, Frye, Gamble, Gore, Gronna, Guggenheim, Jones, La Follette, McCumber, Martin, Nelson, Newlands, Nixon, Overman, Owen, Paynter, Perkins, Piles, Rayner, Shively, Simmons, Smith of Maryland, Smith of Michigan, Smith of South Carolina, Stephenson, Stone, Sutherland, Swanson, Taylor, Thornton, Warner, Watson, Young—54.

Nays: Bacon, Bankhead, Brandegee, Bulkeley, Burnham, Burrows, Crane, Depew, Dick, Dillingham, Fletcher, Flint, Foster, Gallinger, Hale, Heyburn, Johnston, Kean, Lodge, Lorimer, Money, Oliver, Page, Penrose, Percy, Richardson, Root, Scott, Smoot, Taliaferro, Tillman, Warren, Wetmore—33.

Not voting: Aldrich, Crawford, Frazier, Terrell—4.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Upon this question the yeas are 54, the nays are 33. Two-thirds not having voted therefor, the nays have it, and the joint resolution is not passed.

It will be seen that there were 22 Senators who voted for the Sutherland amendment to give Federal control of "time, place, and manner of electing" and then voted against the Borah amendment to allow the people the right of directly electing Senators at all, as follows:

Senator BRANDEGEE, Senator Bulkeley (retired), Senator BURNHAM, Senator Burrows (retired), Senator CRANE, Senator Depew (retired), Senator Dick (retired), Senator DILLINGHAM, Senator Flint (retired), Senator GALLINGER, Senator Hale (retired), Senator HEYBURN, Senator Kean (retired), Senator LODGE, Senator LORIMER, Senator PAGE, Senator PENROSE, Senator RICHARDSON, Senator ROOT, Senator Scott (retired), Senator SMOOT, and Senator WETMORE.

The people of this country are not willing to continue to permit big businesses to run the Senate nor this Government. Upon this issue the Republicans lost Maine, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Ohio, Indiana, and very nearly lost Pennsylvania in the last election, and will lose it in the next election, and they will deserve to lose it unless they reform. If they claim to reform, the people will do well to consider the sincerity of their repentance.

Mr. President, at this late hour I do not care to discuss this matter further. I only want to put in the RECORD the fact that the day of machine politics in control of this country is about ended. I glory in the insurgent Republicans and in what they stand for in reestablishing honest government. I stand with them in their declared purpose to purge this country of corrupt practices through the initiative and referendum, through the recall, the publicity system, the preferential voting for presidential nominations, and through the Oregon system of government, with its people's-rule method, of which every Senator should take note and to which every Senator should give his prayerful and earnest attention.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma to a joint resolution which he himself introduced on July 7, 1909, where he sought to change the Constitution. I will read article 16 from the amendment which the Senator introduced. It is as follows:

ART. 16. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the electors thereof for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote.

That is exactly the language of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution as it is now written, except that, instead of "chosen by the electors thereof," the Constitution says: "Chosen by the legislature thereof." The Senator, when he introduced that joint resolution, never made any attempt whatever to change section 4 of Article I.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I can easily dispose of the suggestion offered by the Senator from Kansas. The Senator from Oklahoma knows more now than he did when he first entered this Chamber, and while he introduced the proposed amendment to the Constitution in 1908 and in 1909 in a form least objectionable to the majority party in control of the Senate, he prefers the Borah amendment for the reasons stated. The Senator from Oklahoma accomplished all he could do by arousing the attention of the country and exciting the leaders of the majority party to offer the amendment in such a form that it might pass.

The Senator from Oklahoma is gratified to have the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Kansas to vie with each other in promoting the direct election of Senators by the people. This reform was asleep until Oklahoma entered the Union and gave it new life and vitality. Oklahoma is entitled to the credit of this reform, but is glad to pass the bay leaves to Idaho and Kansas.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. OWEN. With pleasure.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I should like to know if the Senator from Oklahoma knows of any good reason why there should be a difference in section 4 of Article I, if we amend it, as to the manner of supervising the election of Representatives and the manner of supervising the election of United States Senators, or is the Senator from Oklahoma in favor of doing away entirely with section 4 of Article I, leaving the election of Representatives, as well as the election of Senators, entirely to the people of the respective States?

Mr. OWEN. Absolutely none.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am glad to know that that is the Senator's position.

Mr. OWEN. And moreover, Mr. President——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Do I understand that that is the position of those who are in favor of the amendment as proposed and reported from the committee; that is, that in principle they favor the withdrawal of the right of supervisory control on the part of the Federal Government over the election not only of Senators, after this change is made, but also over the election of Representatives?

Mr. OWEN. Speaking for myself alone, Mr. President, I favor the direct election by the people of Senators and of Members of the House of Representatives, and of postmasters, free from Federal control. [Laughter and manifestations of applause in the galleries.] I am in favor of every post office in the United States——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Visitors in the galleries must refrain from making any manifestations of approval or disapproval.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him further?

Mr. OWEN. Just a moment. The Senator from South Dakota wants to know my view, and I am glad to give it to him, and I speak for myself alone. I am in favor of every post office, through its patrons, nominating its postmaster, with the right of recall, subject to a reasonable civil-service act.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is quite another question.

Mr. OWEN. It goes to the root of this whole question, to the control of the governing function by the people of this country and bringing the government just as close home as possible. I am in favor of every municipality and village writing its own charter and conducting its own business without any meddlesome interference by any legislature, where corruption is often rampant, and where they make professional political profit out of cities and the city values in the States, as every man connected with this Senate knows full well; and I could call Senators as witnesses to this truth on this floor by the score.

Why should the Legislature of New York State deny self-government to Buffalo, to New York City, to Albany, Syracuse, or Utica? Why should any State legislature deny home rule to the cities of the State, or be permitted to levy blackmail on municipalities that must come cap in hand humbly to pray for relief against Pinch bills or to plead for the right to improve their own cities in their own way?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him further?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. OWEN. With pleasure.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I had no intention of diverting the Senator from Oklahoma into a discussion of the selection of postmasters.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from South Dakota has not diverted the Senator from Oklahoma. The principle of placing power in the hands of the people to elect Congressmen, Senators, postmasters, and to govern themselves locally by home rule of cities is the same thing in its essence. It is democracy in its true sense.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I wanted to find out what was the position of the Senator and those who are standing with him. It seemed to me that in order to make this amendment what it should be, to express the wish of the Senator from Oklahoma and those standing with him, it ought to go back to the Judiciary Committee, and come back here as a proposal to entirely repeal section 4 of Article I of the Constitution and have the election of Representatives, together with the election of Senators, a matter entirely under the control of the States. Why should we garble it in such a way as to have one rule apply to the election of Senators by the people while the power of supervisory control is given up as to Senators and retained as to Representatives?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, there is some logical force in the contention of the Senator from South Dakota; but the Senator from Oklahoma speaks for himself alone; he does not presume to speak for any of his colleagues. He is speaking as an individual, expressing his sincere view with regard to this matter, expressing his belief that the sooner this country offsets the unavoidable tendency to centralization by as great a measure of decentralization as is practical and sensible we shall give added strength and stability to this Republic. I therefore believe in doing away with machine government, in ending the undue power of veto in the minority, and in trusting the people with their local matters, just as we trust the citizen with the management of his own house. That is what I believe; and, believing it, I am glad of an opportunity to say it. I believe in both centralization and in decentralization. Centralization gives power and efficiency to the national energies, but decentralization by the fullest measure of home rule gives contentment and efficiency in local management and assures stability and peace among the people, who are better satisfied when they manage their own local affairs free from centralized interference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] to the substitute offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senate, I will withdraw my amendment. I offered it hoping that it might be the ground upon which differing opinions might meet, but I do not believe it will simplify the situation; so I will withdraw it in order that the vote may be taken directly upon the Bristow amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia will be withdrawn. The question then is on the substitute offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] to the joint resolution reported by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. BORAH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, it resulted—yeas 44, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS—44.

Bourne	Crane	Jones	Penrose
Bradley	Crawford	Kenyon	Perkins
Brandegee	Cullom	Lippitt	Richardson

NOT VOTING—3.

Dillingham	Frye	Tillman

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this vote the yeas are 44 and the nays are 44. The Chair votes in the affirmative. The yeas have it, and the amendment is agreed to. The question now is on agreeing to the joint resolution as amended.

Mr. BORAH. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, just a word before we proceed to vote upon the final passage of the joint resolution. I do not expect at this late hour to make any extended comment upon the resolution upon which we are to vote to-day. Its merits and demerits have been discussed so often and so fully that further debate at this time could add nothing to the public knowledge of the question and would have no weight or influence in changing the action which will be taken in this body to-day.

I voted against the measure on a former occasion because I believed it would not bring about a better condition of affairs. I believe that now; but I am convinced that a large majority of the people in a large number of the States desire the opportunity to vote upon this amendment; and realizing that the people must and should rule in the end I propose to vote for this measure and give the people an opportunity to vote upon the proposed constitutional amendment in the usual way, through their legislative bodies.

For myself, I am not convinced that the change in the Constitution of the United States proposed by this resolution would benefit the people of this country or their institutions. Nor am I at all sure that the necessary number of the States of the Union will favor the measure. And in this connection I would call attention to the action of the Republican national convention in 1908 in Chicago, where a resolution favoring the proposed change in the Constitution was rejected by a vote of 866 against it to 114 for it.

The method of electing Members of the United States Senate was not hastily determined upon. On the contrary, it was adopted after long deliberation and debate and after considering also the plan which is proposed by the pending resolution.

Very briefly I refer to this historical phase of the question. After long discussion the plans for electing Senators narrowed down to four: First, they were to be selected by the House of Representatives; second, by the President of the United States; third, by the direct vote of the people; fourth, by the State legislatures. It was contended that the first plan would make the Senate a dependency; the second would be a step in the direction of a monarchy; the third would lead to confusion and to clashes between the farming and manufacturing or commercial interests; the fourth method was unanimously supported by the members of the convention and was finally adopted when the question of the number of Senators to represent each State was settled.

This settlement was effected by the States of larger population surrendering what they considered their right of proportionate representation in the Senate and giving all the States equal representation.

Here, I might ask, if Senators are to represent the people directly, and not the sovereign States, how long will the populous Eastern States like New York, Pennsylvania, or Ohio, be content to exercise no more power in the Senate than the sparsely settled Western States like Nevada, Wyoming, Utah, and others, notwithstanding the original compact.

If there were time countless quotations of approval from recognized great masters of political economy could be given for the plan of State legislative selection of United States Senators. I mention but a few of the many:

Mr. Bryce, in his "American Commonwealth," writes:

> The American plan, which is older than any of those in use in the European Continent, is also better, because it is not only simple, but natural, i. e., grounded on and consonant with the political conditions of America.

James Madison said, in advocacy of the present method:

> When we come to the Senate, its Members are elected by the States in their equal and political capacity; but had the Government been completely consolidated, the Senate would have been chosen by the people in their individual capacity in the same manner as the Members of the House. Thus it is of a complicated nature, and this complication, I trust, will be found to exclude the evils of absolute consolidation, as well as of a mere confederacy.

Alexander Hamilton, in the Federalist, wrote:

> Through the medium of the State legislatures, which are to appoint the members of the National Senate, there is reason to expect that this branch will be generally composed with peculiar care and judgment; that these circumstances promise greater knowledge and more extensive information in the national councils, and that they will be less apt to be tainted by the spirit of faction and more out of reach of those occasional ill humors or temporary prejudices and propensities which in smaller societies frequently contaminate the public councils, beget injustice and oppression of a part of the community, and engender schemes, which, though they gratify a momentary inclination or desire, terminate in general distress, dissatisfaction, and disgust.

The late Senator Hoar, in one of his great arguments on the question, said:

> Our fathers were profound students of history. They found that no republic, although there had been many examples, ever lasted long without a Senate. The term Senate implied to their minds, as to ours, a body of men of mature age and of a tenure of office which was removed from all temptation of being affected by temporary currents of public sentiment. The word Senate is a misnomer when applied to any legislative body of whom these things are not true.

The plan proposed by the pending resolution proposes, in effect, to deprive the Republic of a Senate.

Senator Hoar also said:

> I am convinced that the provision of the Constitution framed by the makers of that great instrument by which the popular will was to be expressed through the representatives of the people in the legislature has been eminently successful in its results, has preserved the rights of the States as such, and has protected their equality and their integrity a well as their powers of local self-government, which are so essential to the maintenance of government by and for the people.

Mr. President, the testimony of the great students and thinkers has indorsed the plan of the creation of the Senate framed by the makers of our Federal Constitution, and in my belief an impartial analysis of its results shows no necessity for a change.

But in a republic in which the powers of the government are derived from the people, it is not for us to say that the people shall not have an opportunity to change this plan if, after calm deliberation, they so decide.

I believe that this Senate is convinced that election of the Senate by direct vote would not be for the best interests of the people of the United States or tend to perpetuate the tried institutions of our Government.

But, on the other hand, the Senate, I believe, does not arrogate to itself omniscience. Higher than its own views it holds the right of the people to express their views upon all questions affecting their welfare. The people of my own State have expressed in the past through their State legislature a desire to vote on this question. This expression was not a recent one, the present legislature which has held a session during the present year having taken no final action upon a resolution favoring the proposed change.

I believe if given an opportunity to vote, and when acting with the responsibility a vote brings, the people of my State will decide this question with intelligence and wisdom and in the line of patriotism and in what they honestly believe will make for the best interests and perpetuity of the Government. Therefore on this question I propose to vote for the resolution with the sole purpose of giving the people of my State and of the Nation an opportunity to record their wishes for or against changing the Constitution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. I am advised by him that he would vote against this proposition if he were present, and as it is my purpose to vote the same way, I will take the liberty of voting. I vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. BACON (when Mr. TILLMAN's name was called). I have been authorized by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to pair him in the negative on this vote if the Bristow amendment should be adopted. If the Bristow amendment were defeated, he instructed me to have his pair announced in favor of the adoption of the joint resolution; but, with the Bristow amendment adopted, I am instructed by him to announce a pair against it. I therefore announce that if he were present the Senator from South Carolina would vote "nay," and that on this vote he is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], who would vote in the affirmative if present.

I also desire to state while I am on the floor that I voted on the Bristow amendment, although paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], because I had his authority so to do.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 64, nays 24, as follows:

NOT VOTING—3.

Frye	Overman	Tillman

The VICE PRESIDENT. Two-thirds of the Senators present having voted in favor thereof, the joint resolution as amended is passed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, with all due respect to the President, I do not desire that the Senate adjourn without registering my protest against the President having cast the deciding vote upon the Bristow amendment. I have not had time to examine the question, but I think there is very serious doubt about the right of the President to cast the deciding vote in a matter of this kind, and I desire to register my protest at this time.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think, Mr. President, when the Senator from Missouri does examine the matter he will be satisfied that the Chair acted within his constitutional rights.

I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from New Hampshire withhold his motion for a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I make the point of order that the matter has not been disposed of. What we have done was in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. There has been no action upon this measure in the Senate. The Chair will remember——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Literally speaking, the Senator from Georgia is right.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think he is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Literally speaking, the Senator from Georgia is right. The joint resolution will be reported to the Senate.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BACON. I desire to reserve the right to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] before the question is put as to agreeing to the amendment which was adopted as in Committee of the Whole. At the proper time I shall offer the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. BACON. I now offer the amendment which I previously offered in Committee of the Whole, but which I withdrew. I now offer it as an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia offers the following amendment to the substitute of the Senator from Kansas, which the Secretary will report.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 of the substitute, after line 2, insert the following words——

Mr. LODGE. A parliamentary inquiry. I thought what was reported to the Senate was the joint resolution as amended in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. LODGE. Therefore the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is now the joint resolution and is pending in the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Not at all. The whole thing is before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is still open to amendment in the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. It is still open to amendment in the Senate, unquestionably.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 of the substitute, after line 2, insert the following words:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may make such regulations in any State whenever the legislature thereof shall neglect or refuse to make such regulations, or from any circumstances be incapable of making the same.

Mr. BACON. I desire again to say that that amendment offered by me is in the identical language of the utterance of the New York convention in adopting the Constitution, stating that that should be the limit of the power to be exercised by Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BACON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BACON (when Mr. TILLMAN's name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] has a pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. With his consent I transfer those pairs and each of us will be allowed to vote. I have already voted, and the Senator from Vermont under that arrangement will also be at liberty to vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], and vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 46, as follows:

So Mr. BACON's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. HEYBURN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it necessary to vacate the former order made on a misunderstanding. Without objection, that will be done.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). Having been released from my pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BACON (when Mr. FRYE's name was called). I again announce, by authority of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], his pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] being the other Senator paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina, as already announced.

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). On the final passage of the joint resolution as amended I am paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. If he were present, he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, resulted—yeas 64, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—64.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the final passage of the joint resolution as amended the yeas are 64, the nays are 24. Two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the joint resolution is passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 10 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 13, 1911, at 2 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 12, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, offered the following prayer:

Blessed be the name of the Lord our God, whose goodness stands approved in a thousand beneficent acts day by day, which pass all unnoticed through our selfish and ignoble ambitions. Forgive us, O Father, and inspire us with clearer vision, nobler aspirations, larger life, in Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INCOME-TAX AMENDMENT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter from the secretary of state of Arkansas, transmitting certified copy of joint resolution passed by the Legislature of Arkansas ratifying the proposed amendment of the Constitution of the United States providing for an income tax, which was ordered printed in the RECORD.

STATE OF ARKANSAS, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Little Rock, June 8, 1911.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In pursuant to the Constitution of the United States of America I herewith transmit to you a certified copy of Senate joint resolution No. 7, ratifying and approving the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to income tax, passed by the respective bodies of the Arkansas Legislature during the session of 1911 of the Thirty-eighth General Assembly.

By this mail a copy of the above is furnished the honorable Secretary of State, Hon. P. C. Knox, Washington, D. C.

Very respectfully,

EARLE W. HODGES,
Secretary of State.
By CHESTER W. TAYLOR,
Deputy.

STATE OF ARKANSAS, DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

I, Earle W. Hodges, secretary of state of the State of Arkansas, do hereby certify that the following and hereto attached instrument of writing is a true and perfect copy of senate joint resolution No. 7, by Senator Rogers, of Benton County. Vetoed by the governor June 1, 1911.

Passed by the respective bodies of the Arkansas Legislature by the vote and on the date given below:

Passed by the senate on 17th day of April, 1911. Total ayes, 24; total nays, 6; absent and not voting, 5.

Passed by the house on 22d day of April, 1911. Total ayes, 64; total nays, 7; absent and not voting, 29.

The original was filed for record in this office on the 1st day of June, 1911.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal. Done at office in the city of Little Rock this 8th day of June, 1911.

[SEAL.]

EARLE W. HODGES,
Secretary of State.
By CHESTER W. TAYLOR,
Deputy.

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 7) of the Legislature of the State of Arkansas ratifying and approving the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to income tax.

Whereas the Sixty-first Congress of the United States of America at the first session, begun and held in the city of Washington on Monday, the 15th day of March, 1909, proposed an amendment to the Constitution of the United States in words and figures as follows:

"ARTICLE XVI. Congress shall have the power to lay and collect taxes on incomes from whatever source derived without apportionment among the several States and without regard to any census or enumeration."

Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Arkansas, That the foregoing resolution, being the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, be, and the same is hereby, approved and ratified.

Adopted by the house of representatives the 22d day of April, 1911.

R. F. MILWEE,
Speaker House of Representatives.
HARDIN K. TONEY,
President of the Senate.

Filed in the office of the secretary of state this 1st day of June, 1911.

EARLE W. HODGES, Secretary of State.

Vetoed June 1, 1911.

G. W. DONAGHEY, Governor.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. PEPPER, for 10 days, on account of important business.

INVESTIGATION OF AFFAIRS OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged resolution (H. Rept. 50) from the Committee on Accounts.

House resolution 200.

Resolved, That all expenses that may be incurred by the committee appointed under the resolution of the House of Representatives adopted June 6, 1911, to make an investigation and an inquiry into the operations and methods of the departments of assessment and collection of taxes of the District of Columbia and such other departments of the District of Columbia as may be determined by them, as well as the organization, capitalization, bonded and other indebtedness, management and conduct of any and all of the public-utility corporations doing business in the said District, to an amount not exceeding $5,000, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives on vouchers ordered by said committee, signed by the chairman thereof, and approved by the Committee on Accounts, evidenced by the signature of the chairman thereof: Provided, That no expenses incurred by members of the said committee appointed under the said resolution for the purpose herein mentioned, in going outside of the District of Columbia, or incurred outside the said District, shall be payable out of the fund designated herein.

The Clerk read the report (No. 50), as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred House resolution No. 200, have had the same under consideration and recommend its adoption, with the following amendment:

In line 16, on page 1, after the word "thereof," insert a period and strike out all the proviso of the resolution.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, the House a few days ago passed a resolution providing for the investigation of affairs of the District, and this resolution is to authorize certain expenditures by the Committee on the District of Columbia in carrying on and conducting these investigations. The resolution as introduced contained a proviso as follows:

Provided, That no expenses incurred by members of the said committee appointed under the said resolution for the purpose herein mentioned, in going outside of the District of Columbia or incurred outside the said District, shall be payable out of the fund designated herein.

Your committee recommend striking out that proviso and leaving the resolution in the form of other resolutions that the Committee on Accounts have heretofore submitted to the House and requiring the District of Columbia Committee to order the vouchers that the same shall be signed by the chairman thereof and be approved by the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. I think the form of the resolution presented is an exceedingly good form.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman whether under this resolution it is contemplated that the District Committee shall have its cab fares and transportation paid within the District?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. That is a matter to be left to the discretion of the District Committee. Any necessary expense that they may incur in making the investigations would, presumably, be covered by this resolution.

Mr. MANN. Ever since I have been a Member of this House many members on the District Committee have believed, and have advocated, that that committee should have the privilege of riding around Washington making investigation at the public expense. I do not say that that privilege ought not to be accorded, but it has never been accorded heretofore. The District Committee has never been authorized to travel at the public expense.

Mr. GARNER rose.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Before I yield to the gentleman from Texas, I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that the object and purpose of this resolution is not to permit the Committee on the District of Columbia to get cab fares, it has a more serious purpose than that. Whether or not cab fares would be included I am willing to leave to the discretion of that committee and to the chairman thereof. I will now yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. I want to suggest that this resolution is only carrying out the instructions of the House in a resolution that it passed on the 6th instant. At that time it was his opportunity to suggest what the methods of expenditure would be, whether they would hire cabs or automobiles or ride on the street cars or walk. It is a little late now to come in and ask the Committee on Accounts to put in its resolution, having brought it in in a splendid form, as the gentleman from Illinois has already suggested, a provision that this can not be used for cab hire.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I beg the gentleman's pardon, but the resolution which came up the other day did not provide for the expenses. This is the resolution which provides for the payment of the expenses. I have no criticism to make of the Committee on Accounts as to the form of the resolution, but made the inquiry because any expense that is incurred before it is paid must be approved by the Committee on Accounts, and I wish to inquire whether it is the purpose of the Committee on Accounts to provide transportation for the District Committee or other committees or other individual Members of the House in the city of Washington.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I take it that the record which the gentleman has made this morning would indicate to the committee that at least on the minority side of the House it would not be agreeable to create an expenditure for cab hire, and it may have the same effect on the examining committee as well as upon the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, in addition to what my colleague on the committee has suggested, I desire to say it is not the purpose of the Committee on Accounts to provide cab hire for the District Committee, but the purpose is to provide all necessary expenses to carry on the investigations into the affairs of the District as provided in the resolution heretofore adopted by the House.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Arkansas yield to his colleague?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, in response to what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] has just said about this being an inopportune time to question the character of the expenditures to be made under this resolution, I desire to say that when the resolution was before the House a few days ago authorizing the investigation of matters in the District of Columbia, I for one did not understand that there was to be an appropriation for the purpose of making these investigations. I think that all the District Committees heretofore appointed have been investigating matters in the city of Washington, and they have been called upon from time to time to have witnesses before them, but I never understood that it was necessary for them to have a specific appropriation in order to make investigations. I am inclined to think now, if this committee is to have $5,000 at its disposal, that it must be intended that some part of it is to be used for the purpose of paying the personal expenses of the committee over the District to make such investigations as they think ought to be made.

I am advised that the committee knows of no wrong that has been committed, but they desire to make an investigation to see whether or not something may not have happened that was not entirely correct. In other words, they propose to make ferrets of themselves to see whether or not there might not be a rat in the hole. If they know of anything that is wrong, it would be well enough to investigate it. I think investigations ought always to be had where wrongs have grown to such a point that Members are satisfied that they have been committed, but when the chairman of the Committee on the District was before the Committee on Rules I remember to have read his statement as it appeared in the papers, and, as well as I remember, he said nothing about any wrong having been committed anywhere; did not know but what the administration of the affairs of the District had been conducted in accordance with law. But, it seems, they want to go out in search of wrongful acts. I am opposed to paying the personal expenses of this committee to make investigations, just as I would be opposed to paying the personal expenses of any other committee in this House if they wanted to take a trip to San Francisco, to Texas, or anywhere else to investigate conditions that they might have under consideration before their respective committees. The facts to be developed here are close at hand, and but little expense should be required to bring them out. If anything wrong has transpired, the witnesses can be called by telephone and they can come here at an expense of 5 cents each. It ought not to require any great expense to investigate the affairs of the city. If we are going into a wholesale investigation of all questions over which the House has jurisdiction, the Chair and the Members of the House can well understand that there is no telling to what extent it will go, where we will stop, or what the expense of these various investigations may be. Legitimate investigations are right—ought to be had whenever necessary—but to make ferrets of ourselves when we do not know whether there is a rat in the hole or not is a mistake, in my judgment.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Arkansas yield to the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. MACON. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I would like to know if the gentleman would be willing for this subcommittee of the Commiftee on the District of Columbia to use the Speaker's automobile in making these visits?

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the members of the Committee on the District of Columbia have any more right to transportation of any kind at the expense of the Government than have the members of any other committee of this House, and I think it was impudence on the part of a member of that committee to suggest that the committee ought to be furnished with an easy way of riding over the city for the purpose of making investigations. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Arkansas yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. For what purpose is it intended to spend this $5,000?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. A resolution was adopted by the House a few days ago authorizing the District Committee to make special investigations along certain lines, to make investigation and inquiry into the operations and methods of the department of collection and assessment of taxes of the District of Columbia, and such other departments of the District of Columbia as may be determined by it, as well as into the organization, capitalization, bonded and other indebtedness, management, and conduct of any and all public utilities, corporations, or businesses in said District.

Now, I have not a copy of the original resolution before me, but the original resolution covered a wide scope, and the purpose of this resolution is to enable the District Committee to pay the expenses of an investigation looking into the various affairs of the District of Columbia. It is not the purpose of the Committee on Accounts in offering this resolution to provide for paying street-car fare or anything of that kind. Witnesses must be had, experts may be required, and other expenses may be necessary.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. What is the nature of this investigation?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I have just read from the resolution provisions relative to the scope and character of these investigations.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Why should a special appropriation be necessary to conduct it?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I have just read from the resolution the purposes of the investigation, and the remarks of the gentleman from New York, as well as the remarks of the gentleman from Arkansas, my colleague, should have been directed against the original resolution. The original resolution, which passed the House a few days ago, reported by the Committee on Rules, was argued at length in this House and passed the House, and your Committee on Accounts, by this resolution, is simply carrying out a policy which will enable the District Committee to make the investigations heretofore authorized by the House. With the merits of the original proposition your Committee on Accounts does not deal; that has already been dealt with by the House, and we are simply following the usual form of resolution used by the Committee on Accounts to authorize these expenditures. If they go into an extended investigation they must have witnesses, they must investigate books and papers, and they must have experts. We do not state in this resolution that they must expend $5,000; that is the limit. The purpose of this resolution is to furnish so much as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of the House in adopting the original resolution.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Did the original resolution provide for a special appropriation for that purpose?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. It did not.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Why should a special appropriation be now necessary? The District Committee is organized; it has clerks; it has time on its hands. I think it is a mistake for us to make any special appropriation for this purpose.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. While the original resolution did not provide for this expenditure I am satisfied it was stated on the floor of the House at the time it was under consideration that this expenditure must be authorized by the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Arkansas yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Speaker, it is not the intention of this committee, I know, from the personnel of the committee, to go into any extraordinary expenditures. There will be some necessary experts needed or accountants to go over the accounts of the auditors of this District, but so far as any expenditure for cab fare or street car fare or any expenses that would be incurred by the individual members, I know for myself, and I believe I speak for the members of the committee, there will be no such expense charged to this appropriation asked for. I have had considerable experience for a number of years in city affairs. I have examined many municipal accounts; I have looked into the public utility improvements and the public utility franchises of our great cities and been up against them, and from my experience, and I can say for your committee and for myself, that there will be and should be no unusual or unnecessary expenditures made in this investigation by the members of this committee of this Congress.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOBECK. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Nebraska yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. LOBECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDWARDS. I take it that the gentleman from Nebraska is a member of the District Committee?

Mr. LOBECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDWARDS. Will the gentleman enlighten the House along the line of the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] and that of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] a few minutes ago, as to why this appropriation is needed at all?

Mr. LOBECK. The only cause, I understand, is that we will need some money in getting accountants to go over the details of the auditing office of the District of Columbia for a period extending back for nearly 40 years. A million dollars is reported as due to the Government by the District of Columbia, moneys that have not been accounted for, a matter that will have to be looked into, and you will well understand that no member of this committee will have the time to go through the books from way back to the beginning. And I am informed by the auditor of this District——

Mr. EDWARDS. Another question, please. What hearings, so far, have been held to demonstrate the necessity of an investigation, the like of which this resolution proposes and for which this appropriation is asked?

Mr. LOBECK. The chairman of the committee has had a great deal of information that there have been some irregularities in accounts in previous times, not questioning the matter at this time. But in years past there has been a lot of accounting that has not been just to the Nation, and he so stated when this resolution was passed.

Mr. GARNER. Is it not a fact, if I may interrupt the gentleman, that the House has already ordered this investigation? The time to have inquired about the necessity for it was at that time.

Mr. EDWARDS. We are considering now the matter of the appropriation.

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS. There are a great number of committees of this House that have done a great deal of investigating without extra appropriations. It is our duty as well to guard the Treasury of this country as it is to make investigations, and I take it that this resolution of investigation proposes to investigate not only the District affairs, but to investigate the various corporations of the District, and, if that is true, I think we already have sufficient machinery to carry that out. I do not believe in turning the House into a jury, so to speak, to make these investigations, inasmuch as we have courts through which to investigate them.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman will yield for a moment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LOBECK] yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]?

Mr. LOBECK. I do.

Mr. GARNER. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Georgia that his remarks would have been very appropriate when the resolution was under consideration authorizing this investigation, but at that time it seems the gentleman from Georgia did not take sufficient interest in it—or else was absent from the Hall—to criticize the authorization of this investigation. After the House has authorized the investigation, it does seem to me that the Committee on Accounts and the House itself should not refuse a sufficient expense fund with which to carry out what the House has already authorized to be done. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD rose.

Mr. EDWARDS. I would like to say to the gentleman——

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. GARNER. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. EDWARDS. I would like to say to the gentleman from Texas that there has been no lack of interest so far as I am concerned, and so far as my attendance in the House is concerned I have no doubt I could measure records with the gentleman from Texas very well. But the question now before the House is a question of an appropriation, and it is a question for us to decide whether or not we shall make that appropriation. I have merely been seeking a little light as to why this appropriation is necessary. I do not think this House ought to appropriate money unless it is absolutely necessary. If it is necessary, I am ready to vote for the appropriation, as I have absolute confidence in the District Committee.

Mr. HARRISON of New York and Mr. SHACKLEFORD rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. GARNER. I yield first to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Speaker, nobody in my hearing has yet given us any reason as to why we should make a special appropriation for this purpose. If it is the purpose of the District Committee to go into the accounts of the District and their relation to the National Government for the last 40 years, they could spend a great deal more than $5,000. They could spend $100,000, most of which, in my judgment, would be wasted.

It is my belief that a great deal of the employment of special accountants is mere flimflam. The District Committee is made up of very live gentlemen, who have had vast experience in municipal affairs, and an investigation of the character that they could give to these matters is of a great deal more value, in my opinion, than the tables of reports that can be prepared by so-called experts.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GARNER. I yield, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from Missouri.

The SPEAKER. To which gentleman from Missouri does the gentleman yield—to Mr. SHACKLEFORD or to Mr. DYER?

Mr. GARNER. I yield to Mr. SHACKLEFORD. He spoke first.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, having been for a time a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I think I can give to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. EDWARDS] very good reasons why this investigation should be made. For instance, there is said to be a railroad in this District capitalized at $666,000 a mile which it cost $66,000 a mile to build. We want to know why we can not have free transfers. We want to know why all the corporations in this city are conducting their affairs as they are. We want to know why it is that the District Commissioners have not brought a better government to this city than they have. We want to know whether all these corporations are conducting themselves within their proper limitations. We want to know whether they are giving the people the best service they can give for the least money.

There are thousands of things that we want to know. At every Congress we hear complaints from Members of the House and from people of the District, complaining that things are not conducted in this District as they should be.

Why are they not? It is because these facts are not properly brought before Congress. Nobody can do it but Congress, and Congress can do it only through a properly authorized committee. These matters should be investigated and corrected, and that can only be done by giving this committee the power of conducting an investigation.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that the corporations and those who stand by the corporations tell us we ought to leave these matters with the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and that they will attend to them. They tell us that Congress ought not to interfere and that we have three good, honest commissioners who can attend to these matters. But, Mr. Speaker, the responsibility lies upon this Congress to right whatever wrongs exist in this city, and it is the duty of Congress to empower this committee to the fullest extent to go out and get the facts; to know why it is that a man in riding upon the street cars must hang on to the fenders in order to get to his destination; to know why it is that this is the worst corporation-ridden city in the world. It can only be corrected by first finding out the facts, by an honest and capable committee, such as we have here in the District of Columbia Committee, and let that committee bring the facts before the House.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I do.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman explain to us what bearing his very eloquent discourse has upon the question at issue, namely, the necessity for a special appropriation?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, this is not a special appropriation. The committee already has authority to make the investigation. Now, the additional authority is given to the committee to incur such expenses as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of the resolution that has already been adopted. The committee has been authorized to make that investigation. It is necessary that the investigation be made. It can not be made unless they are given authority to incur the necessary expense, and that is all that is sought to be done here to-day.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I do.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman has had a long experience on the District Committee. Does he now know to what use you will apply any part of this $5,000, if the appropriation were made, in investigating any of the corporations or the officers of this city here and of the District of Columbia?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Using the phrase of a gallant Missourian who preceded me here many years ago, I will say that "that fact will demonstrate itself as the hilarity of the occasion progresses."

Mr. MANN. No doubt it will result in hilarity.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I assume that that is about all the reason that anyone can give for making this appropriation.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], being a mild-mannered man, overly credulous, and believing that everybody is intending to do the right thing, has never shown the alarm that some of the rest of us have felt, that the corporations of this town were not keeping within their proper bounds. He has never been one of those who have been alarmed at what has been occurring here in this District. He is one of these optimists who believe that these corporations are all acting well within their powers, and that all this clamor about bad management is without foundation.

But I differ from him. The question is asked, "What will you do with this $5,000?" That may be answered by saying we will give it to BEN JOHNSON and LOBECK and these other men on the District Committee, these honest men who are going to perform the task we have commanded them to perform. We are going to authorize them to expend whatever money may be necessary for that purpose within the limits of the appropriation. They will not spend any more than they need.

Mr. GARNER. In that connection may I ask the gentleman a question for the benefit of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Sure.

Mr. GARNER. This resolution provides, first, that this entire District Committee shall pass upon the advisability of any expenditure; and, second, that the Committee on Accounts must approve that expenditure. Does the gentleman from Kansas believe that either of these committees are calculated to expend this money unless it is necessary for the benefit of the United States?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have not anticipated any danger along that line. What I want to know is, in what manner is this money to be expended? I have had a service of eight years on the District Committee, as has the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD]. I attended the meetings of the committee every week. Did the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CAMPBELL. I gave attention to the business of the committee. I have walked over the city, through the streets and alleys, investigating the conditions of the city, for the purpose of acting intelligently upon legislation that was before the committee. I did not require an automobile nor a cab nor any other means of conveyance and have my expenses paid by the Government.

Several Members rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] has the floor and control of the time.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri one minute.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I do not say that I was a close attendant on that committee. I did not see much use of attending. I always found representatives of certain big corporations there whenever I was present, and I never saw them turned down. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why were they not turned down? Because gentlemen had faith that they were doing the right thing. Why should not they be investigated? Because the gentleman from Kansas and others believe they are well within the law. Why should not we appropriate the money for investigation? Because my optimistic friend believes that these big corporations do not, will not, and can not do any harm to the people of the District. I, being a pessimist, believe that they ought to be regulated and regulated intelligently. I believe that the committee ought to investigate them and ought to have the expenses necessary to make the investigation.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Missouri had given his time to the District Committee, as others did, he would have known that men representing the corporations did not control the committee, and if he had stayed there he probably would have assisted the rest of us in directing the affairs of the committee and city intelligently after investigating every question up for consideration.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. In line 13 of the resolution it reads, "on vouchers ordered by said committee." That is, the expense shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives on vouchers ordered by said committee, signed by the chairman thereof, and approved by the Committee on Accounts, and so forth. The term "vouchers ordered," I think, is not a usual expression. What is the intention of that language?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The purpose and intention of the language used is to require that the District Committee, by resolution or otherwise, shall order the expenditures, whatever they are, and then the chairman of the District Committee shall certify to the Committee on Accounts that such expenditures were ordered by the committee, and that all vouchers must be signed by the chairman of the District Committee. Then they are submitted to the Committee on Accounts, which is the auditing committee of the House.

Mr. MANN. I understand that part of it. I take it, then, from the gentleman's statement, that the ordering of the voucher is not to be mere approval of the expenditure after it is incurred, but authorizing the expenditure.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. A previous authorization of the expenditure. Let me explain by giving an illustration of what occurred in our committee on Saturday. Another committee of the House authorized to make investigations brought in a voucher that had not been ordered by the committee. It became necessary for the chairman of that committee to go back and get the authorization, and when it was indorsed, as ordered by the committee, signed by the chairman, and submitted to our committee, we approved it. After the several requirements are complied with by the investigating committee, we go through the process of auditing it and determining whether or not it shall be allowed. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. COX of Ohio. Before the gentleman yields to the gentleman from Texas, will he yield to me for a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will.

Mr. COX of Ohio. It seems to me that much of this talk is superfluous, in the light of what happened the day that the resolution authorizing the investigation was passed. The chairman of the District Committee made the statement then that so much of the $5,000 as would be necessary would be used for the specific and exclusive purpose of employing skilled accountants; that the service of one of the extra committee stenographers would be utilized, and that no money would be expended except to procure the services of this skilled accountant. I think the House has confidence in the good faith and judgment of the chairman of the District Committee.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I want to suggest that, in order to help solve this question, I will tender the use of the clerk of the Committee on Election of President and Vice President. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, there has been a good deal of unnecessary quibbling about this proposition. Some gentlemen seem to have been serious and others have spoken in a vein of levity. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] precipitated a discussion about cab fare, and then the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] provoked another discussion about rats and ferrets. All of these questions are foreign to the resolution before the House.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state to the gentleman that I said ferrets and rats, not rats and ferrets. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman desires to reverse the order of his reference?

Mr. MACON. Yes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have no objection. Mr. Speaker, the proposition is simply this: On a previous day the Committee on Rules reported a resolution authorizing an investigation into the affairs of the District of Columbia. It also gave the committee power to sit during the sessions of Congress and during the recesses of Congress. There is no mystery about the proposition. There is no question that can not be now answered as far as we have information. When the resolution was before the House it was well understood and expected that the committee needed extraordinary power in order to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of documents, and at the same time it was agreed that expert assistance was necessary.

The chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia [Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky] asserted that an expert accountant was necessary in order to inquire into the payment of interest on certain bonds, wherein he charged the United States Government had paid more money than legally obligated, and said it would take an expert accountant to go into these books; that the committee had no assistance at their command, and it would take several hundred or several thousand dollars for that purpose. Again, it was understood that this committee wished to inquire into the department of the assessment and collection of taxes, and it would be necessary to compel the attendance of witnesses in regard to that question and the production of certain books and papers and documents, so that the committee could get at the real facts. And in the third place, it was understood and agreed here that the committee wished to inquire into the affairs of some of the public-utility corporations of the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Not for the present; in a moment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I wanted to interrupt——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. And it was agreed that this committee did not have the resources at their command to go into such questions, and that it would take an appropriation, which would soon follow, authorized by resolution from the Committee on Accounts, to be adopted by the House, and that the sum would not exceed $5,000, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], the chairman of the committee, stated that, in his judgment, the sum should not exceed $2,500. We all understood that. Now, why this quibbling about a small sum? If we can unearth the things the chairman of the Committee on the District believes probable, then we will render the people of this District and of the United States a service worth ten times the $5,000 proposed by this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

[Mr. RUCKER of Missouri addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have great confidence in the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia and in the committee, both on the majority and minority sides, and it is quite possible they may incur some expenses that ought to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, and yet it seems to me a little premature for that side of the House to propose the resolution now. The other day, when the original resolution was under discussion, the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, stated that if any expenditures were incurred by that committee outside of the District of Columbia that it would be followed by his resignation as chairman of the committee, and when the gentleman from Arkansas, a member of that committee, the author of the original resolution, prepared and introduced this resolution it contained this language:

Provided, That no expenses incurred by members of the said committee reported under said resolution for the purposes herein mentioned in going outside of the District of Columbia or incurred outside of said District shall be payable out of the fund designated herein.

When the original resolution was before the House and when this resolution was prepared it was stated that the District Committee should incur no expenses payable out of the contingent fund outside of the District, but they have changed their minds. The moment the fund becomes available the men who can expend it see a thousand and one ways rising above them where the expenses can be incurred, and after the resolution was introduced, on June 10, and before it is reported to-day, it is proposed to amend by striking out that limitation and giving to the committee authority to incur expenses anywhere in the United States under the limit of $5,000.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield for a statement in that connection?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I want to state to the gentleman from Illinois that the proposed amendment is the work of the Committee on Accounts, and no member of the District Committee was even consulted about it so far as I know, and the reason for that amendment is this: In carrying on the investigations authorized we thought it might be necessary for some expense to be incurred outside of the District of Columbia, and we did not desire to hamper the investigation with that limitation, and, further, in reporting former resolutions in reference to these investigating committees we placed no such limitation upon them, and we did not desire to vary from that rule in connection with this resolution. The Committee on Accounts is alone responsible for that amendment.

Mr. MANN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendment will not be agreed to. If the Committee on the District, proposing to carry on the investigation, has asked only for the payment of expenses incurred in the District of Columbia, why should the Committee on Accounts or the House insist upon giving them the temptation of expending money outside of the District of Columbia?

What business is it of the Committee on Accounts to give increased authority to the committee in reference to expenditures which that committee does not desire and does not ask for? Is the contingent fund so large at present that there is no way of expending it except by the Committee on Accounts forcing other committees to have privileges as to expenditures which those committees do not desire? I thought the contingent fund was likely to be depleted. I think very likely that there will be an appropriation asked for to provide for a deficit in the Committee on Accounts. It does not seem to me that we should urge the committee to expend the money. There will be plenty of money expended in these investigations uselessly and without necessity, without forcing them to expend the money.

Take an accountant. Why, the Government has plenty of accountants in the employ of the District which any committee of the House or the District Committee can use in making these investigations. It is not unlikely that if this committee employs an accountant to examine the accounts of the District that it will have to employ another accountant to explain to the committee the meaning of the report of the first accountant employed. Some one, somewhere, must have knowledge of these things. They can obtain that information from the accountant now in the employ of the Government. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution and amendment to its final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The vote recurs on the amendment to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 52.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

THE WOOL SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11019, a bill to reduce the duties on wool and the manufactures of wool.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and the manufactures of wool, with Mr. HAY in the chair.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I always hesitate to inflict a set speech upon the House, and particularly with the temperature in the upper 90 register, and it becomes particularly trying when the atmosphere has become supercharged with the heated discussion of the gentlemen on the other side as to whether the brethren, in conducting what will probably prove to be an altogether useless and unnecessary and futile investigation, shall ride or walk. Personally, I wish to express my sympathy with those who desire on these hot days to ride, and I congratulate the gentlemen of the committee, not owning an automobile myself, that from this time on there will be, or should be, opportunity for various "joy rides," visiting the institutions of the District of Columbia which, I assume, are to be investigated. I have had some doubts as to the economy of consuming $10,000 worth of time in discussing $5,000 worth of expenditure. But perhaps, after all, that is a better expenditure of the time of the House than listening to my speech.

A discussion of the subject of the production and manufacture of wool involves so many problems that one who has any information upon the subject at all enters upon the discussion with embarrassment, because I think the more one studies the problems involved the more he realizes how much there is to learn and how little the best informed know. I can only say, with regard to this matter, that I feel like an old farmer friend of mine who, having been taken to task by a shyster lawyer in the town in which he lived, when he was on the stand as a witness, to the effect that he seemed to know mighty little about the subject under inquiry, said:

> I admit that I do not know everything about it, but what little I do know I know just as well as anybody.

In their piecemeal tinkering with the tariff schedules the Democratic majority in the House, having indorsed Canadian reciprocity and enlarged the free list, to the detriment of the farmers and stock growers of the country, and particularly the Northwest, have now reached the wool schedule, and after much shifting of position and considerable friction and dissension among the brethren have presented for our consideration the measure before us.

This bill proposes to substitute for the specific and ad valorem duties on wool and woolen goods in the Payne tariff a system of ad valorem duties exclusively. In lieu of the present specific duty—of 11 cents per pound on wool of class 1, to wit, fine wools, such as constitute about 75 per cent of the wools grown in the United States and practically all the wool of the Intermountain States; 12 cents a pound on wool of class 2, being long-fibered combing, such as Cotswold and Lincolnshire; and 3 to 7 cents a pound on coarse wool and hair—they propose an ad valorem duty of 20 per cent of the foreign price on wools of all classes.

The specific duties of 11, 12, 3, and 7 cents per pound on wool contained in the Payne tariff were equivalent in 1910, on the basis of the valuations given by importers on the importations of that year, to 47.60 per cent for class 1, 46.54 per cent for class 2 wools, both of which compete directly with domestic wools, and 38.79 per cent for class 3 wools, or an average of 44.31 per cent. So that, assuming that the values were correct and that the protection is in proportion to the ad valorem equivalent of the duties levied, the present bill reduces the duty, and hence the protection, on wools considerably more than half. The reduction on wools partly manufactured is still greater, so that the amount of protection afforded the American woolgrower under the present bill, assuming, for the sake of argument, that an ad valorem duty on wool can be collected without serious undervaluations, probably amounts to about one-third of the protection under the present law.

This bare statement as to the lowering of duties does not, however, fully state the gravity of the situation from the woolgrowers' standpoint, if we are to assume that this legislation will be written into law, and that the Democratic Party will have the opportunity of further carrying out its views and policy touching this industry, for while the bill does place a 20 per cent ad valorem duty on wool, it has been made very plain to the country by the gentlemen on the other side that this is not for the purpose of encouraging or protecting the wool industry, but simply because, so they tell us, they consider it necessary to retain a duty on wool in order to raise revenue.

HISTORY OF THIS MEASURE.

The popular understanding is that in its early consideration of Schedule K a considerable majority of the Democratic membership of the Ways and Means Committee were in favor of free wool, but that later arguments were used which swung the majority to the 20 per cent ad valorem proposition finally agreed upon. At this stage of the proceedings the man who is still the dominant figure in the Democratic Party appeared upon the scene in Washington. We do not know just what argument he used privately, but we do know that Mr. Bryan's paper, The Commoner, contained an editorial in the usual masterful tone of the gentleman from Nebraska, a part of which was as follows:

> If the Democratic Party can be scared by a few sheep growers, it might as well renounce its advocacy of tariff reduction and make an alliance with the Republican Party. * * * Without free wool tariff reform will not amount to much, for the spirit that would lead Congress to tax all the farmers—and all other citizens—who wear woolen goods in order to give a tariff tribute to the few farmers who raise sheep will consent to other tariff exactions until tariff reform will be little more than a farce.

This trumpet call to the Democratic hosts to boldly declare their position as free traders naturally led to a marshaling of the forces friendly to Mr. Bryan in the committee and in the House. But the die was cast, the decision had been reached, and the bill was reported as agreed upon; and thereupon it was loudly proclaimed in certain quarters that the Orator of the Platte, thrice leader of his party, had been defied, thrown down, and thrust aside, his leadership repudiated, and certain others of the brethren who had brought about the result were heralded by their adherents as successors to the mantle of the great Commoner. If the decision reached had been adhered to without qualification there might have seemed to be some justification for the claim that the erstwhile leader had been unhorsed and that the scepter had passed to another.

But right here befell the most significant performance of this complicated play of rival ambitions. The Democratic caucus, after having agreed upon this wholly inadequate duty on wool, adopted the resolution of the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. KITCHIN, as follows:

> Resolved, That the bill revising Schedule K, as presented to this caucus by the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee, is not to be construed as an abandonment of any Democratic policy, but in view of the Democratic platform demand for a gradual reduction of the tariff, and of the depleted and depleting condition of the Public Treasury, as a result of Republican extravagance, a tariff of 20 per cent ad valorem on raw wool is now proposed as a revenue necessity.

This resolution of confession and avoidance revealed the fact that while there are a sufficient number of men in the Democratic majority who can not shut their ears to the tinkle of the sheep bells and the bleat of the lambkins in their districts to force an unwilling majority to grant what purports to be a slight protective tariff under the pretense of seeking to raise revenue, as a matter of fact, the free-trade contingent of the party still dominates, and the man from Nebraska, while seemingly thwarted in his effort to secure a declaration for free wool, did, in fact, prevail. What other construction can be placed upon the announcement of a free-wool policy whenever in their opinion the conditions of the revenue will no longer furnish a cloak for those of the brethren who, while retaining their party regularity, still hope to succeed themselves on the claim of being favorable to policies which will afford some protection to the industries of their districts? And so I say the Nebraskan is still the dominant and dominating figure in the Democratic Party, and while he may not be the party's next candidate for the Presidency, I advise those of our friends who are hoping that the presidential lightning will strike them that they make their peace forthwith with their real leader. [Applause on the Republican side.]

STABILITY NEEDED.

Mr. Chairman, what the wool industry of this country needs more than anything else is stability, relief from tariff agitation and change, freedom from threats and alarms, and assurance of tranquil conditions. I know of no industry of such importance which is so dependent for its success upon assurance of settled conditions, upon confidence that the tariff as it affects the industry shall remain unchanged for a considerable length of time.

The sheep industry is one which, if it promises to be unprofitable by reason of changing and unfavorable conditions, can be speedily liquidated, not at a profit, but generally at some figure less than an absolute loss. The animals themselves will bring some price at all times for the butcher's block. The fleece can generally be sold at some figure, though under threat or in the face of tariff reductions, always at a sacrifice, and so under such circumstances the industry fades from the farm and the range, and the places that once knew it know it no more.

But the restoration of the industry is an altogether different affair. Men forget the methods and details of sheep raising, or a new generation comes to the fore that never knew them. The fields and pastures deserted or occupied for other purposes do not afford, without considerable investment, the appliances and conditions necessary to successful sheep husbandry, and so the industry once declined requires years and decades for its upbuilding.

Further, the market for mutton once lost is but slowly restored, for the use of mutton as a food in large quantities and by large numbers of people is in a sense and to a considerable extent an acquired taste, and once a market ceases to use mutton in considerable quantities, any large increase in consumption is only secured after a lapse of time and to a considerable extent by the offer of the product at low prices.

We have had several notable examples in our history of the disastrous effect on the sheep and wool industry of a lowering of duties and the length of time required to even partially recoup the losses and restore the flocks. Under the tariff of 1867 the industry increased steadily and rapidly in importance and the number of sheep increased from 22,000,000 to over 50,000,000 in 1884. The tariff act which went into effect after the shearing season of 1883, which reduced the duties about 10 per cent and contained a disastrous basket clause, delivered a blow from which the industry did not recover for years. In four years the number of sheep decreased over 7,000,000 and the wool clip over 35,000,000 pounds. As sheep growers adjusted themselves to the modified conditions there was a gradual recovery until in 1893 our flocks had increased to 47,000,000 and our wool clip to about 350,000,000 pounds.

At this point came the historic and appalling disaster which afflicted the country during the days of the Wilson tariff, which placed wool on the free list. While the slight reduction of 1883 was somewhat discouraging, the free trade of the Wilson bill was wholly disastrous. While under the former bill the flocks gradually reduced in number, under the latter they faded with appalling rapidity. In one year there was a reduction of almost 4,000,000, and in four years the number of our sheep had decreased over 13,000,000 and our wool clip over 90,000,000 pounds.

Then came the Dingley Act, with approximately the same duties as the present Payne tariff, and again the number of flocks steadily increased to their present proportion of 57,000,000, with a wool clip of 321,000,000 pounds.

These being the conditions, well understood by men who grow sheep and raise wool, be they in the businses on a large or a small scale, I have no doubt but what some would be willing to make some sacrifice for the sake of stability. There might even be some such who, weary of constant agitation, would be willing to accept a duty admittedly inadequate rather than strive for a higher one, if it meant constant change or threat of change.

But to such men this bill holds out no promise or hope of relief, for, as I have pointed out, before bringing the bill into the House, the Democratic caucus took pains to notify the country that even the poor benefits which might be hoped for in the direction of protection from cheap wool from abroad is dashed by the resolution, which is practically an announcement that the party stands for free wool, and will put wool on the free list if given the opportunity to meet the needs of revenue otherwise. If there had been any doubt on this point, it was dispelled by the speech of the gentleman from Alabama opening the debate on the bill, in which he said:

We disclaim any purpose whatever of writing this bill in the interest of the manufacturer of wool or the producer of wool.

And in answering my interrogation on the subject, he assured the House that no information as to the condition of the wool industry or the effect of tariffs, this or any other, would be of any use or value to the committee in framing a bill from their standpoint, except as it might throw light on the question of revenue, by reason of the fact that their bill was drafted without reference to its effect upon the industries, but solely from the standpoint of revenue.

This is certainly sufficient evidence from a high source of the fact that even the wholly inadequate protection incidental to the revenue features of this bill could not be expected to be permanent if his party was in control of the Government, and therefore these industries and the labor employed in them must look forward, if the Democratic Party is to control legislation, to continuous agitation and further reductions to a free-trade basis. It occurs to me that the situation as thus developed affords no possible excuse for its support by the most moderate protectionist, as it affords no hope whatever to the labor or capital engaged in the industries affected. It can not even afford a toe hold for those Democrats who still hope this measure will serve as a wind shield and be effective in protecting those of them who live in sheep-growing districts from the cyclones that will prevail next fall. [Applause on the Republican side.]

While this is the actual condition of affairs, the fact remains that Democrats from protectionist and sheep-growing and wool-manufacturing districts still hope, while retaining their party regularity, to pose as moderate protectionists under the shadow of this legislation; and that fact is clearly indicated by the pretense that the temporary protection is necessary, as stated in the Kitchin resolution, by reason of the "depleted and depleting condition of the Public Treasury." Thanks to the Republican Party and the Payne tariff bill, the Public Treasury is neither depleted nor depleting, much as the brethren on the other side may attempt to juggle figures for the purpose of justifying that altogether erroneous statement.

From the official statement of the United States Treasury at the close of business June 5, 1911, I find the national receipts of the present fiscal year up to the date mentioned amounted to $625,071,413, while the receipts of last year up to the same date amounted to $604,048,177, an increase in receipts of the current fiscal year over the same period last year of $21,023,236. The total receipts for the fiscal year of 1910 were $675,511,715. The disbursements were $659,705,391, leaving an excess of receipts over disbursements for the year 1910 of $15,806,324. The excess of receipts above expenditures for the current fiscal year up to June 5, 1911, amounted to $9,078,008. A reasonable estimate of corporation and other taxes coming in will make the surplus on June 30 not less than $35,000,000.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Good.

Mr. MONDELL. Surely these official figures leave no basis whatever for the extraordinary statement made that revenues are necessary owing to the "depleted and depleting condition of the Public Treasury."

I believe I have made it plain that no one who believes in the doctrine of protection to American labor and American industries, no matter how moderate their views may be with regard to the amount of protection which should be granted, no matter how moderate their desires and expectations relative to protection of American industries from the underpaid labor of foreign countries may be, will give their support to this measure, in view of the frank avowal that it is merely the first step in the direction of removing any duty that may be protective in character.

Let me further suggest that I do not understand how anyone who declares for tariff for revenue only can support the measure, unless their blind adherence to that doctrine shall have deafened their ears and hardened their hearts to such an extent that they are willing, in order to secure revenue, to sacrifice labor and ruin industries. The gentleman from Alabama has evidently reached that point, for he frankly admitted in the course of his speech the other day that he expected their bill would reduce the price of wool in the country.

EFFECT OF THE BILL ON THE SHEEP AND WOOL INDUSTRY.

It may be asked on what I base my assertion that the bill before us will have an injurious and in many cases a ruinous effect upon the labor and industries affected by it. It occurs to me that the argument which the committee has used in defense of its measure admits and proves that fact beyond controversy.

The customs receipts for the fiscal year of 1910 on imports of wool of all classes was $21,128,728 and from manufactures of wool $20,771,964, or a total of $41,900,692.

The committee estimates an annual revenue under their bill of $40,556,000—from imports of raw wool, $13,398,000; from imports of manufactures of wool, $27,158,000.

In order to obtain this increased revenue there must be an estimated increase of raw-wool importations of 103,800,000 pounds and an increase in the importations of manufactures of wool having a raw-wool content of at least 87,000,000 pounds, or total increased importations of wool in the unmanufactured and manufactured state of approximately 190,000,000 pounds. Our domestic production of wool in 1910 amounted to 328,110,749 pounds, our imports 256,606,638 pounds, or a total of domestic and imports of 584,669,867 pounds, the percentage of the domestic to the entire supply being 56.12 per cent.

In order to produce the estimated revenue under this bill there must, as I have said, be an increased importation of practically 190,000,000 pounds of raw wool and wool in the cloth, an amount equal to nearly 60 per cent of our present domestic production.

What do the gentlemen on the other side expect is to become of the 190,000,000 pounds of domestic wool thus displaced? Do they expect the American woolgrowers to burn it up, to throw it into the sea, or to slaughter their flocks in order to reduce the production sufficiently to make way for this increased foreign supply? I assume they do not expect the American producer of wool to make such a disposition of his product all at once, at least, and therefore the only alternative is, assuming that the gentlemen are correct in their estimate of increased importations, that the price of American wools will be reduced under the fierce competition of foreign wools to a price which will not afford even a fraction of the apparent protection of 20 per cent contained in this bill.

In order to make way for the increased importation of foreign manufacturers of wool which the sponsors for this bill confidently predict, a very considerable percentage of American mills and factories must be closed; the employees thrown out of employment and compelled to lend their unwilling influence toward a reduction of the general level of wages by seeking other lines of employment. The only alternative for the farmer and the flockmaster will be to discharge a large proportion of his employees and reduce the wages of the remainder in order to meet the conditions forced upon him by the competition of cheap foreign labor.

If we seize the other horn of the dilemma and take the view that the committee is entirely mistaken with regard to increased importations under the proposed legislation and that the increases would not amount to anything like the sum estimated, then what is to happen with regard to the revenues which the majority insist is so badly needed? Then would come home to the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle the warning of their great leader, whom they seem to be attempting to temporarily discredit, when in the editorial in the Commoner to which I recently referred he thundered:

> Let no Democratic advocate of a tariff on wool masquerade behind the pretense that he is voting for a revenue tariff. Let him not add hypocrisy to the sin he commits against his party.

So, gentlemen, whichever way you take it, your sins would be sure to find you out if it were possible to write this legislation on the statute books. Fortunate are you, and the people of the country, that you have not the power at this time to do it, for if you did your bill would not produce the revenue you claim, but the labor and industries affected would be calamitously injured, and you would stand convicted of the hypocrisy, which the most influential man in your party charges you with, in reporting and voting for this bill.

PROTECTION—ITS EFFECT ON THE WOOL AND WOOLEN INDUSTRY.

In a speech I made a few days ago on the so-called free-list bill, I said as to the principle and policy of protection:

> No argument ought to be required in support of it in this country. The greatest story of temporal things that the world has ever heard or witnessed in its unfolding is the story of the great progress, advancement, and prosperity of the American people under the protective-tariff system.

And no part of this story of our industrial growth and development under this system illustrates more clearly its benefits and advantages than the history of our development as the great wool-producing, manufacturing, and consuming people.

In 1860 there were about 22,000,000 sheep in the United States, and our wool production was approximately 60,000,000 pounds, according to the estimates of the Agricultural Department. Our imports of wool were 26,000,000 pounds and our imports of manufactures of wool amounted to $43,000,000.

In the year 1910 we had over 57,000,000 head of sheep, from which we obtained about 328,000,000 pounds of wool. The same year we imported in round numbers 256,000,000 pounds of raw wool and manufactures of wool to the value of a little over $23,000,000.

In 1860 our manufactures of wool were estimated to have a value of $73,454,000, and the wages paid in the wool-manufacturing industries amounted to $11,699,630.

In 1905 we produced manufactures of wool valued at $380,934,003, and paid wages in the industry to the amount of $70,797,524.

These figures show that since 1860 we have increased the number of our sheep over two and one-half times, or over 35,000,000; that we have increased our manufactures of woolen goods considerably over five times, or to the amount of over 307,000,000 of dollars. The wages paid on the woolen industries in 1905 were about six and one-half times greater than those paid in 1860, being approximately $59,000,000 greater; and, better than all else, labor received for its share over 18 per cent of the total value of manufactures of wool in 1895, as against 15 per cent in 1860.

In 1860 our domestic production of manufactures of wool was only 37 per cent of the total of production and imports, while in 1895 our domestic production was over 95 per cent of the same. In 1860 our per capita consumption of wool and equivalents was 6.80 pounds; in 1910 it was 7.11 pounds.

Surely this is a showing which ought to be abundantly gratifying to any American citizen, and one which affords ample justification for the policy of protection; but I realize that, so far as the Democratic membership of this House is concerned, it is utterly useless at this time to appeal on behalf of protection, even of the most moderate character; for, intoxicated by their temporary success of last fall, they are fondly imagining that a certain amount of criticism in the country of certain features of the Payne tariff bill indicates a repudiation of the protective policy. Were they not bound by an ironclad caucus agreement which prevents them from voting for any amendment on this measure, however much they may individually approve of it, it is very clear that the majority on that side would vote for an amendment, if offered, placing wool on the free list. If I understand the Democratic position aright, it is that if the wool and woolen industries of the country can not get along without tariff protection, they should be allowed to decline and perish.

But, Mr. Chairman, the great majority of the American people still realize the importance to our wage scale and to our standard of living of the maintenance of the protective policy, and to them we shall appeal from the blinding hallucination of the majority, who are to-day illustrating the truth of the saying, "Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad."

IMPORTANCE OF THE WOOL INDUSTRY.

It can be said without fear of successful contradiction that in the entire range of human industries there is none of large proportion the establishment and maintenance of which is so essential to the welfare of a people in peace and in war as the allied industries of the raising of sheep and the manufacture of their wool.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming another hour.

Mr. MONDELL. At least one great nation imports most of its food supply and still prospers, but there are none of the advanced nations of the world who do not produce a considerable quantity of wool and who have not extensive woolen manufactories. The growing of sheep is the earliest form of husbandry of which we have a record; the fabrication of wool is the first form of manufacture of which we read in history. The care of flocks and the manipulation of fleeces is therefore the most ancient, as it is among the most honorable, callings of man.

If sheep are raised as an incident to farming operations, they utilize the waste places of the farm and consume weeds and browse that would otherwise be worse than valueless. In the land of little rain, in the regions of the mountains, in the rough and broken country, East and West, North and South, unfit for ordinary agricultural uses, flocks of sheep utilize grasses and herbage, much of which but for them could not be advantageously utilized, producing millions of dollars of wealth, adding vastly to the comfort of the Nation, through the use of products that would otherwise largely go to waste.

Great as is King Cotton, the fleece of the sheep is far more indispensable, for it can be used for almost any purpose for which cotton is used, and it serves an infinite variety of purposes in the manufacture of apparel for the person and goods and furnishings for the home for which there is no satisfactory substitute.

Not only is the flesh of the sheep among the most palatable of food products—rich, juicy, and healthful, invariably free from the disease and contamination that often renders other meats dangerous to health—but the presence of sheep on the farms and the ranches of the Nation has an important effect in moderating and equalizing the cost of meats and in preventing combinations to advance prices of meats. The farmer can utilize mutton for the use of his family when, owing to the size of the animal, it is impossible for him to furnish them with fresh beef,

The dweller in the country village can purchase from the neighboring farmer lambs and sheep and utilize them upon his table when otherwise he would be compelled to purchase his meat supply almost entirely from the butcher, who is possibly but an agent of a great packer. In the cities when an attempt is made to unduly enhance the price of beef and pork through combinations, or when the price becomes usually high through natural causes, the opportunity to substitute mutton for other classes of meats tends to keep prices within a reasonable range.

In peace the products of the flocks of our country add to our comfort and enjoyment and in war they furnish us with material for clothing and blankets for the soldiers in the field, without which we would be almost as helpless in the face of an enemy in a long and arduous campaign as we would be without ammunition for our guns. But for the sheep and wool industry we would in time of peace be shorn of many luxuries and comforts and in time of war we would be naked to our enemies. Yet this is the industry, ancient and honorable, useful and necessary, producing wealth from waste, employing hundreds of thousands of men, from the shepherds on the plains to the operatives in the mills, which the Democratic Party does not consider entitled to any consideration as to its present status or future prospects in the framing of a tariff bill.

NECESSITY FOR PROTECTION.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want briefly to go into the necessity for a protective tariff for the maintenance of the wool industry, and I will try to be brief, for this is a hot day, and I fear that interest will wane if I trespass too far.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman leaves that part of his speech, I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. MONDELL. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. I want to ask the gentleman if the mutton value of the sheep would not make it profitable without the value of the wool at all?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think there is any place on earth where the value of the carcass alone, without the wool, would pay for raising the sheep. In the western part of Australia for many years men were able to raise sheep, because they could be raised cheaply, for the fleece alone; that was before the building up of the frozen-meat industry. But I never heard it suggested that there was any place on earth where sheep could be raised profitably simply for the purpose of producing mutton. The mutton sheep often produce heavy fleeces, and while the fleeces are not so valuable per pound scoured, they are so much heavier than the fleece of some of the fine-wool sheep that oftentimes the coarse-wool sheep, the mutton sheep, produces a fleece that is as valuable as the fine-wool sheep.

If the woolgrowing industry in the United States is not to be sacrificed and largely wiped out, the necessity for protection is as great as it ever has been in our history, and this fact is realized not only by the woolgrowers themselves but by all those who have given careful study and consideration to the subject. In the volume entitled Wool Growing and the Tariff, prepared and issued as one of the Harvard economic studies, Chester Whitney Wright, who has perhaps given as much careful study and thought to the question as any man in the country, and who certainly can not be charged with having examined the subject as a protectionist or from a protective standpoint, says, speaking of the present tariff:

If the industry is to be maintained in a position of the same relative importance as formerly, a higher tariff will be necessary.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; certainly.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Does not Mr. Wright in his statement say that the enemy of sheep-raising for wool is dairy farming and corn growing and stock raising, and that if adequate protection is to be maintained in the future it must be not only against the importations of wool from abroad, but protection of our sheep-raising industry against the dairy farming and corn raising?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Wright does not put it quite in that way?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Almost precisely word for word.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman does not want to be unfair, I know, because he is always fair, but what Mr. Wright did say was that not only was there necessity, if we are to maintain the industry—and he leaves that question entirely to the Congress, I am pleased to say, without passing an opinion upon it—that if the industry is to be maintained in importance there must be as high or higher protection than we have had in the past, and he refers to the fact that that is not only necessary by reason of the competition of foreign wools, but that it is also necessary, or at least the necessity for it is accentuated, by the fact that as a country grows older there is a disposition to use sheep pastures for other purposes, and therefore there must be an encouragement to the growing of sheep because of the natural inclination to grow other products. That is the statement.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Does the gentleman agree to have incorporated into his remarks the exact language?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman quoted Mr. Wright substantially and I have quoted him substantially. Mr. Wright in his book does say that a protective tariff is needed, and higher than we now have, if we are to maintain the industry. That is the important matter. Mr. Wright is only one man, it is true, but he writes from the standpoint of a student and not a protectionist, and that is his statement in regard to it, so that the man who is in favor of free wool can not get anything out of Mr. Wright's statement to please him or satisfy him.

Whether we believe that a higher tariff than that now on the statute books is needed, it is true beyond all controversy that the maintenance of as great an amount of protection as that given by the Payne law is absolutely essential, and this arises from many facts. In the first place, as our lands increase in value and the growing of agricultural crops becomes relatively more remunerative than the growing of sheep, the natural tendency is toward other lines of production.

In the West, in the region of the great ranges, as the necessity of obtaining more and higher priced lands increases and the cost of ranging becomes greater through the charges for grazing in the mountain pastures controlled by the Government as forest reservations, the profits of the industry grow smaller.

For a number of years past the cost of labor on the farm, range, and ranch all over the country has steadily increased, thus adding to the cost of woolgrowing and sheep production, particularly in the Mountain States, which now produce 50 per cent of our wool. In that region particularly the cost of wool production has mounted steadily for the past 10 years.

Under the Wilson bill of unhallowed memory, sheep tenders, herders, the men on the ranches, in our western country, were glad to work for $25 a month. You could hire them by the score at that price, and they were hanging around asking for jobs. To-day, or at least until this threat of Democratic revision, you must take off your hat to any gentleman you may desire to employ to assist you in the care of your flocks, and in addition to that politeness and the promise of fare worthy of the Waldorf-Astoria, plenty of canned cream and California canned goods in heavy sirup and all of the delicacies of the season, you must agree to pay him from $35 to $55 a month. That is the condition confronting us, and it is a condition brought about by protection, protection that keeps from our shores the flood of the products of foreign labor elsewhere and makes it possible for the American workman to compel his employer to give him a large wage and a good living. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Where formerly the woolgrower depended on the free public range, he must now make large investments in land, and if he utilizes the mountain ranges he must pay a considerable sum for the privilege. Where a few years ago, particularly under the free-wool conditions of the Wilson bill, he paid $25 and $35 per month and board to the men who cared for and tended his flocks, he must now pay from $40 to $55 per month and board for the same class of labor.

With the shortening of the range comes the necessity for a great amount of winter feeding of hay and grain, all of which adds largely to the cost of his product.

Furthermore, the western woolgrower is suffering at the present time from the effect of the unparalleled severity of the winter of 1909–10, during which he either lost a considerable portion of his flocks or was compelled to make a very heavy outlay for feed, or both. Following this came the short lamb crop of the spring of 1910 and a summer of very unusual drought and short feed, which left stock in a condition unfit for profitable marketing, and on top of these dispensations of Providence came the affliction of a Democratic majority in this House—which I hesitate to ascribe to the powers above—with its threat of tariff revision and inadequate duties or free trade.

If in the face of all of these calamities a majority of the woolgrowers of the region from which comes the major portion of our fine wools shall escape bankruptcy, it will be due to the practice of the most rigid economy and the most careful business methods on their part, and more to the fact that the majority which presents this bill in the House has not the power to write it into law.

One thing is certain, and so patent that a fool may not err therein, and that is that without tariff protection the woolgrower of the United States, and particularly the woolgrower of the intermountain States, can not prosper. In fact, unless his labor cost is lowered, he can not exist without protection from the cheap labor which produces the wools of the world, and particularly the wools of the first and third class, for nowhere is there as cheap agricultural labor or pastures, measured either by the daily or monthly cost or by the cost per head of sheep, as in Argentina and portions of Australia and Asia proper.

THE TARIFF BOARD.

The Tariff Board, under authority of Congress, is now busily engaged in the work of securing information with regard to the cost of production of wool and sheep, both at home and abroad. When their labor shall have been concluded, as I understand it will be by December next, they will, if I mistake not, present an array of facts relative to comparative costs at home and abroad which will not only warrant the maintenance of the present protection of the wool industry but even justify an increase on the basis of a tariff sufficient to cover the cost of production at home and abroad, and no constituent of mine has ever asked me to stand for a protection that does more than fairly equal the cost of production at home and abroad. [Applause on the Republican side.]

In other words, a protection that makes it possible to be Americans and not Chinese or East Indians. [Applause on the Republican side.] That makes the man upon the American farm a farmer and not a peasant. [Applause on the Republican side.] That makes the man who irrigates the land of our country a proprietor and not an Egyptian fellah; that makes the employees in American mills self-respecting, marching to their labor well fed and well clothed, the young women with feathers in their hats and finery upon their backs going to a short day's work with a fair wage. Compare these with the poor, miserable East Indians crawling their weary way to the miserable barracks called factories over under those torrid suns, and working like a slave for from 12 to 14 hours for a pittance so meager that it would scarcely pay the car fare of an American factory girl coming back from work. [Applause on the Republican side.] And yet the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] thinks he can safely beat down the barriers that have maintained here, under the providence of God, protection against the products of the poor unfortunate millions of foreign lands with whom we sympathize but to whose level we refuse to reduce our people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I would be glad to do so.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Suppose the Tariff Board, in its forthcoming report, should report the difference in the cost of production here and abroad in wool to be only about 5 cents a pound, would the gentleman vote for a bill that adopted that rate?

Mr. MONDELL. I will vote for a bill that will fairly measure the cost of production at home and abroad, and if I do have an opportunity to vote for such a bill I will probably vote for a bill higher than the present schedule. Now, I will ask the gentleman a question: If the Tariff Board makes it very clear that there is a considerable difference between the cost of wool production at home and abroad, will my friend vote for a tariff sufficient to cover that difference?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman has perfectly well understood—he has several times alluded to it—that I believe first and last and all the time in free wool, and I want to say to the gentleman specifically, in answer to his question, that I consider his theory of the difference of the cost of production at home and abroad as the merest moonshine; that it is impossible to ascertain and impossible to apply.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course, the gentleman means the question of whether a bricklayer shall receive $5 a day in the United States, as compared with $1.50 to $2 a day in Belgium and Germany; the question of whether an American carpenter shall receive $3.50 in the United States, as compared with $1.50 in continental countries; the question of whether men employed in the wool and woolen industries of this country shall be paid two or three or four times that paid to the same class of labor elsewhere and be able to live better, dress better, have more comfort and infinitely more luxuries; I realize this is all moonshine to gentlemen on the other side of the aisle, but I want to suggest these things are not moonshine to the American people [applause on the Republican side], and I am glad that he has uncorked the moonshine and let in the fierce light of denunciation that will beat against any such destructive theory as he proposes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] has just alluded in tearful accents to the fact that he is for free wool and undoubtedly laments he was unable to convince his other colleagues on the Committee on Ways and Means to that theory. However, the gentleman has won one creditable victory at least. He has convinced his colleagues on the majority of the Ways and Means Committee of the futility, as the gentleman from Alabama said the other day, of a tariff board, and I desire to congratulate him and the gentleman from New York on having enlisted under his banner the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Alabama, both of whom made eloquent speeches about a year ago in favor of a tariff commission.

Mr. MONDELL. I thank the gentleman from Ohio for refreshing our memory on this matter. But why talk of the consistency of gentlemen on the other side of the aisle! [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SIMS. I would like to ask the gentleman this: In a publication sent out headed "Benign Protection," by Fred. W. Simons, of Philadelphia, he defines protective tariff in a few words, as follows:

> A tariff is a protective tariff just to the extent that it restricts or prohibits the importation of the products of foreign labor that would be competitive with the products of American labor if imported, and it is not a fully protective tariff unless it is practically prohibitive.

Is that a correct definition of what the protective tariff is?

Mr. MONDELL. I am not responsible for anybody's definition of what a protective tariff is, except that of my party. I do not know the gentleman who is referred to. My friend from Tennessee might ask me what my views were on the Deity, and if somebody's definition of the Deity squared with mine. I can not answer for the gentleman from Philadelphia. I am not responsible for his views.

Mr. SIMS. I only wanted to know if you adopted them as your own, and if any tariff less than a prohibitive tariff would protect the sheep industry?

Mr. MONDELL. A less tariff than a prohibitive tariff would protect the sheep industry.

Mr. SIMS. Fully protect it?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know what the gentleman means by "fully protect." But it would "satisfactorily protect."

Mr. SIMS. "Fully protect" are the words used.

HAVE OUR TARIFFS ACTUALLY PROTECTED THE WOOL INDUSTRY?

Mr. MONDELL. Not content with announcing their hostility to any consideration of the interests of the woolgrowers, the Democratic majority of the Ways and Means Committee have endeavored to create the impression that the tariff on wool has not actually increased the price of the domestic wool product above the foreign product to any considerable extent. If this contention were true, then the entire argument on which the clamor for lower duties is founded falls to the ground.

If the price of domestic wool has not been increased by the amount of the tariff duty, it must be due to the fact that the importer has by careful selection of fleeces been able to get the foreign wool in at a price which does not justify or compel him to pay for American fleeces utilized for the same purposes a price higher by the amount of the tariff than the wool he imports; and if this be true, what becomes of the clamor we have heard for years that the poorer people of the country were prevented from wearing woolens because of the high price of wool?

In their effort to create the impression that the tariff has not been beneficial to the woolgrowers, and seemingly unmindful of the fact that if they could prove it their case as to the necessity of revision would fall, the committee in its report, on page 25, presents a table under the caption of "Comparative prices for unwashed wool, 1880 to 1910." I suppose they intend to be understood as affording a comparison of the American price of a certain grade of wool with the London price of the same grades in the same condition and at the same time.

As a sample of gross inaccuracy, to designate it by no more emphatic term, this table is a bright and shining example. It does not purport to be what the caption represents it to be, for a footnote calls attention to the fact that while they quote the figures of Ohio fine washed fleeces from 1880 to 1889 they quote the figures of Ohio fine unwashed from 1890 to 1910. These figures are compared with foreign wools presumably in the same conditions during the entire period. Not only this, but the comparison is with Southdown and Lincolnshire fleeces—coarse combing wools.

The merest novice knows that these various classes of fleeces are entirely dissimilar in character and price, and even a student in the kindergarten class of the wool business knows that one can not accept as a fair comparison prices of one class of fleece washed and another class unwashed.

Anyone at all familiar with the wool business appreciates the difficulty of making fair comparisons from statistics between the prices of domestic and foreign wools, owing to the wide difference in quality and condition, and I do not propose to attempt to do it. A reasonably fair comparison can, however, be made between Port Phillip and Ohio fine wool, and a study of the market indicates that under ordinary conditions, under the present tariff law, there is a difference between the London price of Port Phillip and the price of Ohio fine, both unwashed, of from 7 to 13 cents, the Ohio fine being higher by that amount. This is conclusive evidence that the tariff does increase the price received by the American woolgrower under the tariff. As I have said before, if this is not true, why all this hullabaloo as to the increased cost of wool and woolens by reason of the tariff?

If the Democratic majority of the Ways and Means Committee intended to prove anything at all by their table on page 25, they must have intended to prove that the tariff did not raise the price of wool in the United States at all, for assuming that they intended their table as a comparison of similar values, we find that in various periods referred to in the table Ohio wool actually brought a lower price than the foreign wool with which it is compared. For instance, in 1910 they give Southdown as 29 cents a pound, import clothing wool as 25 cents, and Ohio as 24 cents; so, if this table proved anything it would prove that the effect of the tariff was to lower the price of American wool below that of foreign wool. Is that the judgment of the Democratic majority of the Ways and Means Committee, and is that the sort of misinformation which they desire to disseminate through the country?

As protectionists we hope and expect that a duty like the duty on wool, at least specific duties such as we have provided, will increase the price of domestic wool above that of foreign wool of the same shrinkage and quality by approximately the amount of the duty. Aside from the primary purpose of revenue—that is, what the duty is expected to accomplish—and the only regret that we have had has been due to the fact that owing to the infinite varieties of wool, the widely differing conditions in which it is grown and into which it is manipulated, it is impossible at all times to secure to the grower the full protection of the amount of the tariff.

It is absolutely impossible to do so while the Democratic Party is clamoring for lower duties, thus giving those who are interested in "bearing" the wool market an opportunity of doing so for months at a time to the great detriment of the woolgrower.

In 1909 Territorial wools, as they are called—the wools of the Mountain States—were selling for from 17 cents to 24 cents a pound. Under the threat of downward revision the prices have been reduced 5 or 6 cents a pound below these figures. Of course, it is not possible to "bear" the market permanently in that way, but the conditions surrounding the wool market are such that buyers by running short and using up the surplus before making further purchases are able for a time at least, and sometimes long enough to affect the sale of an entire clip, to press the price down toward a free-trade basis.

We had that condition under the Wilson bill, when the threat of the calamity that was to follow had the effect of plunging the market toward a free-trade basis nearly a year before the passage of the bill; while the tremendous importations in anticipation of its repeal glutted the market sufficiently to maintain low prices for more than a year after it was taken from the statute books.

Thus the price of Ohio medium washed wool dropped from 34 cents in 1892 to 26 cents in 1893, 21 in 1894, 18 in 1896, and only got back to 31½ in 1899, more than a year after the passage of the Dingley bill. During that period the woolgrowers of the country lost, as the effect of the Wilson bill, more than $150,000,000. Their flocks dwindled from 47,000,000 to 36,000,000 head, and the loss in the value of the wool crop was not less than $20,000,000 a year for four years, and probably considerably more, in addition to the loss to the country of having our annual wool production reduced by about 75,000,000 pounds.

INEQUALITY OF SCHEDULE K NO EXCUSE FOR THIS MEASURE.

The Democratic Party can not excuse itself for the legislation now presented by the claim that Schedule K in the present tariff bill is unreasonably high and contains inequalities. If we are to admit, for the sake of argument, that Schedule K is the Republican frying pan, we will not better conditions by jumping out of it into the Democratic fire. I am not one of those who believe that under present conditions Schedule K is perfect.

At the time it was originally framed, and as originally framed, it was, in my opinion, fair and equitable, but the adoption of the skirting clause was unfair to the woolgrowers, and the change which has come about in the character of import wools—particularly wools of class 1—has made the schedule a less fair and equitable one than when originally enacted. But admitting that the schedule is not perfect, that it is no longer scientific, the fact remains that the criticisms of it have many of them been without information or knowledge, have been the mere cuckoo echo of those who had personal reasons for this criticism, and have, in the main, grossly exaggerated the faults of the schedule.

From the standpoint of the woolgrowers of the Intermountain States, at least, there has been but little ground for complaint of it. In fact, many of the criticisms of the schedule have been on the ground that the woolgrowers of that region were securing an advantage over those of other regions—a claim having little foundation.

The claim is that inasmuch as class 2 wools may be imported washed for the same price as in the grease, while washed wools of class 1 must pay a double duty, therefore class 2 wool is not so well protected as class 1 wool. If it were true that class 2 wool could be more cheaply and advantageously imported under the tariff than class 1 wool, the importations of that class of wool would be stimulated and reach larger proportions, particularly in view of the fact that of the domestic product less than 25 per cent is wool of class 2. What are the facts? Out of a total importation of 256,000,000 pounds imported last year only 31,000,000 pounds were of class 2 wool, and for years our total imports of long combing wool of that class have been less than 5 per cent of our total imports. This disposes of the argument that class 2, or combing wool, is not as well protected as other wools.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAY). Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. In justice to the gentleman from Wyoming, I think he has stated the very reason why this discrimination was made, because, in 1867, when the discrimination was first made in the law, there were practically no importations of class 2 wool. That is the reason why it was put in the law.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman knows that the importations of class 2 wool, compared with the importations of class 1 and class 3 wool, have always been small, and they have not grown very greatly in the years that have passed.

Schedule K of the present tariff law has one virtue which no ad valorem measure has, and one like it can not have, no matter how high the rate may be, and that is, the duties being specific—a given number of cents per pound—the woolgrower has the same protection regardless of the fact whether foreign wools were low or high; whereas under an ad valorem duty the woolgrower receives the least protection when he most needs it—that is, when foreign wool is low—and thus he loses the feature of protection which above all others is the most valuable to him—that of stability.

Speaking for myself alone, if my party had the duty imposed on it at this time of revising the tariff and had the information the Tariff Board will furnish, I should support considerable change in the form of Schedule K. I believe that the only fair and just and equitable basis for a tariff on wool is the basis of the scoured content—not, understand me, a tariff based on the amount which the wool will shrink, but a tariff of so much a pound on the basis of scoured wool; the amount of scoured wool in any given lot can easily be determined. Only two classifications would, in my opinion, be necessary. Those would be a classification including all of class 1 and class 2 wools, and a classification including class 3 wools.

Now, under such a tariff we would know exactly what protection we were getting. We would know exactly what the manufacturer was paying on the basis of the scoured wool imported, whether he imported it scoured or in the grease. We would know exactly what would be a fair amount of compensatory duty.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. If the gentleman was writing Schedule K, has he suggested all the changes in the present law that he would make?

Mr. MONDELL. I have only referred to those relating to the wool rates of Schedule K; probably some other changes might be advisable; of course, the compensatory rates on woolens would have to be adjusted. I do not pretend to have the knowledge on all of the items of the schedule that some gentlemen in the House have. I am inclined to think, however, that a duty of so much a pound on scoured wool would be fair, equitable, and just, and would give us a sound basis for the compensatory duties necessary to add in order to protect the manufacturer.

NO COMFORT TO CRITICS OF SCHEDULE K.

Those who have assailed Schedule K during the Payne tariff-bill discussion in this and another legislative body, and who have continued those assaults since, will find little comfort in this measure. Certainly there is no comfort in it for those who criticize Schedule K claiming to be protectionists, for in framing this measure the committee did not adopt any of the remedies they proposed, in the main the suggestions were that the alleged inequalities in the schedule, so far as wool is concerned, should be corrected by specific duties levied on wool on a basis of shrinkage.

Such was the amendment offered and valiantly contended for by the late Senator Dolliver and those who agreed with him. The form of duty they proposed was as foreign to this measure as is Schedule K as it stands to-day, and while the Democratic brethren and the Democratic press applauded the agitation they created and profited by the dissatisfaction with Schedule K which that agitation produced, when they came to frame their tariff bill they repudiated the plan proposed by the so-called progressive Republicans and brought forth a bill not only framed on an entirely different basis than they had proposed, but wholly inadequate in the protection it affords and coupled with the threat of further reductions to a free-trade basis.

Even that fraction of the carded woolen manufacturers who have criticized Schedule K can find little comfort in the bill as now presented, for, if I mistake not, they will find the protection granted them wholly inadequate to enable them to meet foreign competition in certain lines, and they, too, must realize that this is but the beginning of trouble if the Democratic Party has its way about it and that the precarious conditions which this measure would create would be rendered still more intolerable by the threat of further reductions.

I will not assume the responsibility of saying that an ad valorem duty on wool might not be collectible without disastrous undervaluations and might not afford protection if it were high enough, though experience teaches us, and it is the judgment of most of those best informed on the subject, that such a duty would not work satisfactorily. It would certainly lead to all manner of schemes of undervaluations which might or might not be thwarted.

We purchase wool from practically every country on the globe, civilized and uncivilized—from all the nations of Europe, from Russia in Asia and Europe, from Turkey, from China, from India, from the Straits Settlements, from Australia, from half a dozen different points in South America—and the wool grades all the way from the extremely fine Saxony wool down through the fine merinos and less fine crossbreeds to the hairy sheep of the mountainous country, including the camel's hair and Angora fleeces, an infinite variety coming from the ends of the earth, purchased nobody knows where and from nobody knows whom.

I saw a statement a short time ago of the purchase on the plains of Hindustan of a large wool clip. Pray tell me where is the appraiser that can fairly appraise that compared with the Southdowns and Cotswolds and Lincolns in England and the direct and transshipped Australian and South American fleeces coming into the market. And the same thing applies to native wools from the ends of the earth. In my opinion it is utterly impossible to assess such duties fairly if the importer is dishonest.

The result is that this bill offers no hope whatever to any woolgrower, for its 20 per cent provision would be entirely inadequate if it were enacted into law, by reason of the threatened further reduction under which the market would be immediately placed on a free-wool basis. It proposes a plan under which it would be utterly impossible for the agents of the Government to place a fair estimate on the value of the wool coming into the country.

We have a very excellent illustration of that in the values placed on carpet wools, over a hundred million pounds of which we import yearly. Men who know the wool business know that 90 per cent of the carpet wools of the world are worth more than 12 cents a pound. And yet over 90 per cent of the carpet wools that were imported in 1909 were imported at 4 cents a pound, on a valuation of less than 12 cents a pound.

Such a duty is unquestionably subject to the very material criticism that it would afford the least protection when protection was most needed, but however that may be, the bill before us would not afford anything like adequate protection, even were it fixed as a permanent policy, and would afford no protection worth mentioning if adopted as presented as a mere temporary makeshift, a way station on the road to free trade.

I do not pretend to be sufficiently well informed with regard to woolen manufacturing to know whether the protection proposed in this bill is grossly or only seriously inadequate. I do know that if the Democratic Party guessed right when they guessed in drafting the Wilson bill that an average ad valorem of 47.84 per cent on manufactured goods was a reasonable protection on the basis of free wool they are threatening the destruction of American woolen industries in providing an average ad valorem duty of only 42.55 per cent on woolen goods in this bill, carrying, as it does, a 20 per cent ad valorem on the raw material of these manufactures.

If this rate of duty should prove to be inadequate, as I believe it would, the ill effects would not begin and end with the manufacturers or their employees, or with the communities which these employees support, or with the farmers who supply these employees with products, but would extend to and be equally, if not more, disastrous to the wool producer, for an adequate duty on manufactures of wool is as essential to the prosperity of the American woolgrower as an adequate duty on the wool itself, for what would a duty on wool profit the woolgrower if the duty on woolen goods was so low as to close American factories, reduce American consumption of wool, and send him to the markets of the world with his product, where his tariff protection would be valueless to him?

Mr. LONGWORTH rose.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LITTLEPAGE). Will the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Before he passes from the consideration of class 3, I wish to say the gentleman a few moments ago made a statement, as I understood him, that during the year 1909, 90 per cent of all so-called carpet wool imported was imported at the 4-cent rate.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman those figures came to my mind as I was making the statement. My recollection is that they are correct.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The statement surprised me very much, because, while I have not the figures before me, my recollection is that during the 10 years of the Dingley law substantially about the same amount in value was imported under the 4-cent rate and under the 7-cent rate; and the complaint of the carpet people was that inasmuch as they had to buy all of their products abroad 12 cents was made a basis below which it was very difficult to buy the wool abroad. In other words, that wool was quoted to them at 12 cents a pound and a very small fraction, and that they were compelled to buy at least half of the total supply at above the 12-cent rate.

Mr. MONDELL. I thank the gentleman for the inquiry, if he has any question about the accuracy of the statement. I think the gentleman will find it correct.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It was rather surprising that such a great change should have come in the last year or so.

Mr. MONDELL. Why, they are getting on to our tariff just as they would accommodate themselves and their business and their conscience to the ad valorem provisions here proposed. They are getting in at the only loophole that the present Schedule K gives them, and the gentleman now proposes to relieve them from the difficulty of coming in through loopholes and to open the door wide for this class of undervaluations.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Do not say "the gentleman" as referring to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. I was not referring to the gentleman from Ohio. I am not charging him with this crime. [Laughter.]

On examining the tables on pages 87 and 88 of the committee report I find the imports of class 3 wool at a duty rate of 4 cents a pound in 1909 to be over 76,000,000 pounds; the imports at a duty of 7 cents a pound something over 9,000,000 pounds. The same tables indicate an importation of class 3 wools, valued at 12 cents a pound or less, for 13 years, from 1898 to 1910, to be about 74,000,000 pounds per annum out of an average of about 90,000,000 pounds of class 3 wools, or roughly over 85 per cent of the total.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY. Is not the illustration the gentleman gives an illustration of an actual fraud occurring under a specific duty; there being a specific duty of 7 cents a pound for wool valued under 12 cents and 3 cents a pound more if it is valued higher? Does not the gentleman's illustration convict the specific duty as much as the ad valorem duty?

Mr. MONDELL. I am glad the gentleman asked the question, because it illustrates the fact that you ought not to have any ad valorem duty or basis in a wool schedule. That is one of the faults of Schedule K—that change of from 3 to 7 cents a pound on carpet wool. While I know that it is true that everybody in the business claims they do not use this third-class wool for clothing to any extent, I know, and every man knows who takes the trouble to notice the clothing that is worn throughout the country and that he wears himself, that a very considerable amount of carpet wools are made into clothing.

Mr. HARDY. Then I understand the gentleman believes that the very cheapest and poorest wool should be taxed as high per pound as the finest wool?

Mr. MONDELL. The fact is that carpet wools, so called, are not necessarily the poorest or the cheapest of wools. It is true that carpet wools in the natural state are often cheaper than other wools. The wools that are brought into our market as carpet wools are not all of them poor wools. They seem to be imported to a certain extent by men who are able to accommodate their consciences to undervaluations.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, just one question. I want to set myself right. I do not undertake to say that I am an expert on the wool question, but I wanted to get the gentleman's principle, which, as I understand it, is that whether the wool is poor or not poor, the temptation may be if you have different rates for different grades to undergrade them, and the gentleman's example—that is the case where different grades of wool had different specific duties—shows that under specific duties they are undergraded, and therefore I understand the gentleman to say that he is opposed to any kind of ad valorem measure, and he wants all things to come in under a specific duty, without any different grades, at so much per pound, whether it be good, bad, or indifferent.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, well, everybody knows that if all men were honest and if Government agents were all wise, and were mind readers, and they could in all cases assess the actual value, the most scientific duty is an ad valorem duty; but the history of mankind teaches us that an ad valorem duty simply tends to lead men, or tempt men, to undervaluation, and is therefore difficult and impossible of successful operation. Answering the gentleman's question now as to the amount of the duties on a given article, I do not think there is any disagreement on the proposition that specific duties should be levied so as to as nearly as possible assess an equal ad valorem equivalent upon values, but not so as to give the opportunity for undervaluations and fraud as we have under the carpet clause.

Mr. HARDY. Just one question more.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield any further, because I have but little time, and this is somewhat of a side issue.

Mr. HARDY. I wanted to ask the gentleman only one question.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. HARDY. I want to ask if the grading of wool, giving different specific duties for different grades, does not afford the same opportunities for fraud that a general ad valorem duty would?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I said in answer to the gentleman's first question that I did not approve of the two rates of duty as to third-class wools in Schedule K. In my opinion, it would be better if we only had one, and the experience under it illustrates how dangerous is anything that approaches ad valorem duties or has the element of ad valorem in it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I shall be glad to.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Wyoming whether he thinks the present specific rates on raw wool are equivalent to fair ad valorem rates, considering the different grades of foreign wool with which our domestic wool is brought into competition?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I expect to reach that matter in a very short time, and if I do not cover it I would be very glad to have the gentleman refresh my memory.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman has pointed out what he claims to be the defect in the ad valorem duty, claiming that it would tend to fraudulent undervaluation, and I want to know if the gentleman proposes to discuss the objection to the specific rate advanced by our western growers, due to the enormous shrinkage in our western wool, amounting to two-thirds as compared with the comparatively slight shrinkage of the foreign wools that are brought into this country in a raw or unwashed state, at a specific rate, and that are scoured after they get into this country?

Mr. MONDELL. The western woolgrowers, the mountain woolgrowers, have had little complaint of Schedule K. Some complaint has been voiced on the part of woolgrowers who grow long combing wools on account of the single rate of duty on washed and unwashed wools in class 2. Their claim has always been that we had the best of it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I would like to say to the gentleman I think we ought to have been complaining, in view of the fact that our woolgrowers state they have been selling their wool for 12 cents a pound under an 11-cent specific duty, and it strikes me we ought to have some complaint.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; I think they have a most serious complaint and a valid indictment of a party which by its agitation of a tariff bill presses the price of wool down pretty near to a free-trade basis. [Applause on the Republican side.] It is tariff agitation that has done it, and until that agitation started, as the gentleman well knows, his flockmasters were getting all the way from 19 to 24 cents a pound for mountain wool in the grease, and they are getting 5, 6, and 7 cents less than that now. Whenever there is a rift in the clouds and a ray of light comes in upon us and things look more favorable to a Republican victory next year, then the price goes up, but whenever things look a little dark and this fear of Democratic disaster grows the price goes down.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I want to ask a question directly in the line of the gentleman's argument.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield for a question.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I want to know if the proposed tariff bill on Schedule K caused the price of Wyoming wool to decline from 22¾ cents a pound in 1907 to 15§ in 1908, a decline of fully one-third in value of Wyoming wool?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the best answer to that is that it is not quite accurate.

The price of wool has been generally steady and firm, and upward ever since the passage of the Dingley bill, until there came the threat of tariff reduction in the revision under the Payne bill, when again, as I have stated here before, the threat of tariff reduction made it possible for the buyers to beat down the price, not to the extent suggested by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN], but, unfortunately, to a considerable extent. Again, after the passage of the Payne bill, the wool market recovered to its normal condition and continued in that condition, until there came the threat of downward revision last year, when again the market was beaten down.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado rose.

Mr. MONDELL. I can not yield further at this time. I want to explain to the House briefly how it is that these threats of tariff revision can and do send the wool down to pretty nearly a free-trade basis.

Most of the territorial wools so called—that is, the mountain wools—are sold to eastern buyers. When times are good and conditions are propitious, and there is no agitation of tariff revision and no fear of Democratic victory, the wool buyers come into the field about shearing time, or a little earlier, and they bid against each other for the clips, going around from place to place, visiting the shearing pens, examining the clips. But the moment that there is a threat of tariff revision the buyers remain in Boston and Philadelphia. They stay at home. If they come into the market at all, they come to make inquiries about the weather, and the prospect of a grass crop, and they talk to the sheepmen about their families and how they are getting along. They have the least interest in the sheep business and in the wool business of anybody in the world, under those circumstances.

Up to within 30 days ago there were scarcely any offers in all that mountain region for wool at any price. Now, the wool owner might make a trip to Boston. But he is generally unaccustomed to selling his wool in Boston or Philadelphia; he is accustomed to selling it at home. In order to prevent the "bearing" of the wool price to the extent to which it was so manipulated formerly, the intermountain woolgrowers have recently organized in self-defense and built cooperative wool warehouses in Chicago and Omaha, to which they now ship their wool in considerable quantities when there is no market for it, when there is an agitation, when the price is being depressed, and when the buyers refuse to purchase at a fair price. The buyers always carry at least a year's supply of wool on hand, and there is no difficulty whatever in their using up that supply to the last pound before they go into the market for new purchases. And so this commodity can be placed almost on a free-trade basis for a considerable period before a tariff revision. We had the best illustration that anyone would desire of that fact under the Wilson bill.

MISREPRESENTATION OF SCHEDULE K.

Of all the political fairy tales, half truths, exaggerations, and downright misstatements that have been made respecting the added cost of living by reason of the tariff duties the most mendacious and inexcusable are, perhaps, those which have been made with reference to the effect of the duty on wool and woolen goods.

A bright and shining example of the misstatements made along this line, which in my opinion are unworthy of a great party, is contained on page 41 of the report signed by the gentlemen who have brought this bill before us for consideration. This particular gem of sophistry is intended to convince the American people that the duty on imported cloth, such as they say is worn by "great masses of our people," is much greater than the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, and they attempt to prove it by a table in which they fix the element of labor entering into the manufacture of such cloth at 25 per cent interest, depreciation and other charges at 15 per cent, and materials at 60 per cent.

Pray, what is this "material"? What constitutes the depreciation and other charges? Was there no labor involved in the production of the wool that went into the material? Was there no labor involved in the caring for, feeding, and tending of the animals which produced the wool; in shearing it from the backs of the sheep; in hauling it to market; in transportation by wagon and rail; in the scouring, carding, combing, and spinning? Is there no labor involved in the construction of mills; in the building of the machinery; in the equipment of the plant on which the depreciation occurs?

And does it make no difference that the man who tended the sheep received from $30 to $50 in our country as against from $10 to $20 for the same class of labor elsewhere; that the man who shears the sheep receives twice as much for doing so in our country as he would receive most anywhere else in the world; that the labor which prepared the raw wool for the weaver was paid from two to four times as much as similar labor elsewhere; that the man who laid the brick in the factory received from $5 to $6 a day instead of from $1.50 to $2.50 in a foreign country; that the machinists who built the machinery, the men who installed it, received wages from two to three times higher than those paid to similar mechanics elsewhere? Apparently to our friends on the other side all these things mean nothing, and they seem to be prepared, in the hope of getting the support of certain classes of people, to bring down the rate of wages here to the level of foreign lands.

What a logical mind it was that lumped all the toil and effort and expenditure of muscle and energy contained in that 60 per cent in the one word "material," in the hope that the thoughtless and uninformed might be convinced thereby. Really, when I read such flagrant and barefaced misstatements in an official report, I wonder if the gentlemen who wrote it do not have the same estimate of the intelligence of the American people generally that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] expressed with regard to the farmer when he poetically referred to him as one who has "the emptiness of ages in his face."

THE DEMOCRATIC DONKEY.

The Democratic majority of the House Committee on Ways and Means has now put the Democratic donkey through all the paces he is expected to be expert in during the coming national campaign, and in addition to grooming him in a bewildering variety of fancy sidesteps and double somersaults, all accomplished while looking both ways at once, special attention has been given to the perfection of the chameleonlike qualities of rapid color changing, for which he has long been famous.

To such a remarkable extent has the latter valuable and unique quality been developed that while heretofore he has, with remarkable success, been able to totally change his color and appearance in passing from one State to another he is now guaranteed to have become so sensitive to political atmospheric changes as to be able to distinguish the boundary of congressional districts, no matter how bewilderingly gerrymandered, and to assume instantly a profound change of form and a complete change of color, as well as of bray, on crossing these wholly artificial boundaries.

For instance, in the district of the head ringmaster, the accomplished gentleman from Alabama, he will appear in his natural tariff-for-revenue mule color, branded with "incidental protection only when it can not be avoided." His bray will echo the historic words of his trainer, uttered on the floor a few days ago, "No industry in this country is entitled to the fostering care of the Government."

In passing from Alabama to the district of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], he will have his most trying feat to perform, changing his color to the sickly yellow of a near-protectionist, and his hoarse honk will, so far as possible, be mellowed to repeat the words, "We believe in protection for the long-staple cotton and the grape fruit of this district, but we reserve the right to denounce protection elsewhere." [Laughter and applause on Republican side.]

From Florida to the district of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] will be as easy as a Sabbath day's journey, as no material change of hue will be required; but the protective bray will shift from the vegetable to the mineral note and be most mellifluous when uttering the word "mica."

Before leaving the State of North Carolina our noble animal, whose praises were so recently sung in deep bass for the edification of the House by the gentleman from Kentucky, will be subjected to one of the most trying lightning changes of the campaign in passing into the district of the other gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. Here he must assume the light drab, which is a combination of the Alabama and Florida colors. This combination is rendered more difficult and reflects greater credit on his training by reason of the fact that there must be a perceptible change toward the Florida yellow whenever the animal pronounces the word "peanuts." [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Our highly trained animal is subjected to a less serious draft in his color pigment cells on passing to the district of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GEORGE], though there will be repeated demands for modification of tone and color as he passes through the various districts en route. Arrived at the district referred to, however, he may assume the Alabama color with a slightly darker hue, which, however, should shade into a pirate black as he brays his declaration that "American labor must look out for itself as we batter down the floodgates and invite in the products of foreign labor to take the place of that our labor now produces." In this particular district, not loud but strong, our trick animal will be permitted to gurgle that if the farmers and ranchmen and miners can not carry on their business without the aid of tariff and the market afforded by protected industries they should abandon their plebeian occupations and move to town and learn of the blessings of the single tax.

The exact color scheme and vocal tone that shall be assumed in the factory districts of New England has not been fully disclosed, but will undoubtedly consist of the saffron hue of "local and sectional" protection, while in as mellow tones as the animal's vocal organs will permit, accompanied by a devilishly sly wink, will be brayed the sweet Massachusetts Democratic chorus, "We long to work the farmer and buy his crops for a song; when he pays his bills to our countless mills he'll find them high and long." [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

I really regret to forecast the experiences of the Democratic burden bearer in some of the western districts. I understand that at some points in the Northwest the animal will invoke another of his marvelous powers—that of becoming invisible. That will not serve the purpose everywhere, however, and in the region of woolgrowing and towns on the Canadian border it is said his color scheme will be a piebald combination of all the various hues he is trained to assume.

In the district of my good friend the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] the accomodating beast will, I fear, be sore beset, for while conditions will call for a color less fading than the near-protection yellow to withstand the sharp penetration of the suns out there, color changes will be difficult in the presence of the flocks of the region, as it is well known that the donkey is sightless in the presence of a woolly back since this bill was reported and can no longer look a sheep in the face. [Laughter.]

I regret the time at my command will not allow me to pursue this marvelously interesting subject. I have made but a few brief and inadequate references to what promises to be the most marvelous exhibition of a trained donkey since the days of the late lamented P. T. Barnum, a reference to whom reminds me that it is said that the trainers of the Democratic donkey take the same view of the American people as did the aforesaid Barnum, to wit, that the American people like to be fooled; and I might add that, like Barnum, they seem to like to be the fellow who fools them.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman, while he is entertaining the committee with his observations on the various characteristics of the donkey, please tell us just what the Republican elephant is trumpeting now, whether his clarion call is the same in Pennsylvania that it is in Ohio, the same in Massachusetts as it is in Montana, whether it sounds reciprocity or standpatism or just what. We enjoy the gentleman's speech very much. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MONDELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is applause at the question. I take it that the question, then, is either witty or profound.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not doubt that it is profound to the gentleman, and I hope he will make it witty.

Mr. MONDELL. The trumpeting of the Republican elephant is always triumphant and on essentials always on the same note. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Was that true last November?

Mr. MONDELL. That is true always.

Mr. SHERLEY. Including last November?

Mr. MONDELL. On nonessentials, liberty, why, even the liberty to kick and complain and give the gentlemen on the other side an opportunity to get a little ammunition, but on essentials like protection, unity always. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Does that include reciprocity?

Mr. MONDELL. Reciprocity is not an essential.

PROTECTION WILL TRIUMPH.

Mr. Chairman, anyone who knows me knows that I am a protectionist. I believe in the principle and the policy of protection to American labor and to American industry. I believe that we have been able to establish conditions here of better wage rates and a higher standard of living largely by reason of the protective tariff, and that we can not maintain these standards without adequate protection. Holding the views I do, this bill, frankly drafted and presented without regard to what its effect may be in the maintenance and upbuilding of industries, and, therefore, upon the continuation of employment and the maintenance of a good wage scale for American labor, is a measure conceived in economic sin and brought forth in political iniquity. It has not even the virtue of being equitable in its injustice, for it contains provisions of varying ad valorem rates which will be as burdensome in their operation as it is claimed the varying specific rates in the present tariff are. Its sponsors can not claim for it the poor virtue of establishing a policy, even though an unwise and mistaken one, for they admit it to be but one step toward something even worse than the measure itself.

Fortunately for the country it can not become a law, and has been presented by the Democratic Party in plenty of time so that the destructive character of the proposal in its present form and in its threat of further disastrous legislation may sink deep into the minds and hearts of the American people.

That it will arouse our people to a realization of the danger which confronts them through Democratic tariff legislation I have no doubt, and that they will rally to the standard of Republicanism and protection and elect a Republican President and a Republican House of Representatives in 1912 I have increasing confidence.

Then any inequalities that may exist in our tariff legislation will be remedied by the party which in drafting its legislation does have a care for and considers the interests of those of our people engaged in and dependent upon the industries affected. [Loud applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY].

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, the cries for help that are going up to-day from the Wool Trust barons and beneficiaries of Schedule K are pathetic and heart-rending.

The cry of Cæsar, "Help me, Cassius, or I sink!" as he was buffeted by the waves of the troubled Tiber, is as the song of a jolly joust compared with this dying appeal.

"Spare Schedule K!" pour in the pleas through the lobby and the mail. The post-office messengers are humpbacked and worn with the loads of woolen literature they carry to the Members, and in the heat of a sweltering summer. But it is the winter of discontent with these high-protection bandits, who have the country "all bound round with a woolen string."

The American people are, however, breaking those bonds. They began to loosen the knot in 1910, and will have it untied completely in 1912. Not only will the woolen thongs be severed, but all the others that have held them helpless while the trust bulls fatten in the people's pasture.

Only a year and a fraction away is the time of reckoning, when broken platform pledges and promises will have their final accounting, and Schedule K, with all its iniquities, will be wiped out; when other Payne-Aldrich schedules will be revised in the interest of the many and not for the enrichment of a favored few.

It is with this certainty, made doubly sure by the wise action of a united Democracy, that no wool jungle can separate nor steel projectile pierce, that the people can bide their time—the time when the party that has kept and is keeping its pledges will take its place of power and administer the Government for the benefit of all. In that prospective happiness the people can enjoy the swan song of the G. O. P. They can even with complacence listen to the cry of the woolly old hypocrite appealing to the Congress to spare his Schedule K. It suggests the immortal lines of George P. Morris, "Woodman, spare that tree," to whose memory due apology is made for the following:

STATESMAN SPARE THAT K.

I.

Statesman, spare my schedule!
Touch not a single line!
For years it has protected me;
Looked after me and mine.
'Twas dear Sereno's hand
That made it our own way;
So let it, statesman, stand,
My own dear Schedule K!

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

II.

That old high-tariff bunk!
Its wide, protecting wings
Cover wool and shoddy
And tariff-armored things;
Statesman, forbear thy ax!
Cut not its trust-bound ties;
Oh, spare my woolen tax,
Now towering to the skies.

III.

When but an infant trust,
I sought its mighty aid
And, tell it if I must,
I sure was amply paid.
Specific is the duty
And ad valorem too;
Combined they are the booty
That enrich our favored few.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

IV.

My purse strings round thee cling
As twining vines in May,
In which the trust birds sing
My loved one, Schedule K!
Old sched, thou god of wool!
From now till judgment day
We'll fight, we'll throw the bull,
My sweetheart, Schedule K.

[Loud applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD].

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, in the year 1908 there appeared certain sacred words, familiar to this House, which at the beginning of what I have to say I desire to read as the text of my remarks. These words are—

In all tariff legislation the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries—being the tariff statement from the Republican platform of 1908. It is a great pity, Mr. Chairman, that those words were printed only in the English language. It is a great pity they were not translated into Japanese, that they might adorn the cabs of the 720 American locomotives on the Japanese railways for the benefit of the Japanese engine drivers. It is a great pity they were not translated into Chinese, that those in Manchuria who are wearing American cottons might know how self-sacrificing the makers were in selling them to them. It is a great pity they were not translated into Javanese, that the machinery my own house has sent to the Dutch East Indies might tell to the Malays there how beneficent a factor we have been to them. It is a great pity they were not translated into Hindu, that the stokers of the Calcutta electric-light works might know how generous was the American firm that sold them their forced-draft plant.

It is a great pity they were not published in Melbourne, that my acquaintance there, who bought half a million dollars' worth of American hardware between New York and San Francisco for sale in Australia, might know how kind those American manufacturers were to him. It is a great pity they are not printed in Dutch or German, that my former customers in Antwerp and in Berlin and Dusseldorf might know my generosity. It is a sad thing that those words should not be sent widely abroad, that the unselfishness and kindness of our American manufacturers to those outside the limits of our own country might be made more clear than it now is. Because, Mr. Chairman, those men abroad, many of whom I know, have an idea that the American manufacturers were selling them those goods because they could afford to do so, and I must confess that until I saw the language of this platform I had myself always supposed it was quite possible and proper to sell to those countries abroad at a reasonable profit.

But since the difference in the cost of production is said to be always such that we need protection against the manufacturers abroad, let us look more closely at those words.

Speaking from a manufacturer's standpoint, Mr. Chairman, I venture to think it can be shown that this statement of the Republican platform has these definite characteristics:

First. That it involves certain contradictions, well known to manufacturers, which destroy its force.

Second. That it assumes the existence of facts that either do not exist or whose existence can not be accurately ascertained or clearly defined.

Third. That it may involve, if taken to be true at its face as it reads, such discrimination against some American manufacturers and in favor of some foreign manufacturers as is certainly unjust and would, I believe, be conceded to be improper even by its authors.

Fourth. That it ignores the nature of cost and the nature of competition, and, taken at its face, calls for the removal of the duties on many American manufactures.

Fifth. As applied to Schedule K, it has worked grave injustice to our poor people and disaster to many American manufacturers.

Those things I believe at the end of 25 years' manufacturing experience.

I have been an attentive listener, so far as I could, to the discussion on this bill, and on the tariff bills that have preceded this, and certain facts, or the absence of certain facts, have forced themselves deeply upon me. Certain of the fundamental things with which we manufacturers are all familiar have not been mentioned here. Certain of the most essential things that in a manufactory I look for have not appeared in the debate. I have not heard a single word upon this floor of those things about which I should tell a costkeeper to be watchful. I have not heard it mentioned that there are many, many elements of cost, not one or two or three, but many and complex elements. And, therefore, because I have found it possible, and because I know hundreds of American manufacturers have found it possible, to compete in the markets of the world openly, it is for that reason that I have ventured, though a new Member, to speak at length upon this important question.

How does it happen, Mr. Chairman, that in a quotation recently made for machinery to a mine in Japan the American price was $215 less than the English price? How does it happen that those American locomotives are running upon the Japanese railways, upon those of Formosa, upon those of Manchuria? How does it happen that American engines are sold in Hongkong? How does it happen that I sent one day before yesterday to Rangoon? These are sold in open competition with the makers in Great Britain. I happen to know what those locomotives cost, relative to those made by German and English manufacturers, and I happen also to know this, which is one of several stories which will illustrate this particular contention, namely, that last January I was in the city of Tokyo, and a friend who was with me took a large contract, by the way, from the Japanese Imperial State Railways, in open competition with Germany and England, for several million dollars' worth of locomotives. That gentleman went to the head of the locomotive shops of the Imperial Railways, and the Japanese master mechanic said to him: "We can make locomotives much cheaper than you can in America. We have American equipment, and we can produce them for less than you can." "Can you?" inquired my friend. "If so, let us get at the facts. If you will tell me from your cost sheets precisely what your locomotives cost, I will tell you what ours cost." And, by the way, he said: "What makes you think that your locomotives cost less than ours?" "Why," he said, "because we only pay one-fifth the wages to our men that you pay to yours."

So they got out the cost books, and they found that the fact was that the labor cost for locomotives on the same specifications was three and one-half times greater in the Japanese shop than in the American shops. And that is a perfectly normal fact and not an abnormal one. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

How does it happen that this other thing came to be true? I went to the city of Birmingham one day. If it was impossible to sell there the goods I went to sell, I was either ignorant or foolish. However, I went. My English competitor, whose factory I would burn if I had it—my leading English competitor being very busy on other work—said to me, "Mr. REDFIELD, will you take a contract to manufacture a standard line of my goods in quantities and turn them over, delivered in Manchester, so that I can make 10 per cent profit upon them?" I said, "Certainly." I should have been delighted to have the order. He said he put it up to his board of directors, but their British pride was too much. But I wish I could have had it.

And now to show another phase of this question—I am not going to tell stories all the afternoon, but to show another phase I want to tell an incident that took place in the city of Liege, in Belgium. That city of Liege has the lowest priced industrial labor in Europe. It is absurd that an American manufacturer should attempt to sell goods in Liege, but still they do. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

I spent the day with a large buyer there, and all the morning we discussed prices, which were satisfactory, and quality, which was satisfactory; and I went back in the afternoon fully expecting to get an order. But the old gentleman then told me of certain action in the New York customhouse whereby the duty on his goods had been raised—for he sold largely in the American market—and he said to me: "Your goods are satisfactory and the prices are right, but I shall not give you an order, because you shall not come to me with one hand saying 'Thou shalt not enter,' and with the other hand, 'Give me your business.'" [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. REDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Before the gentleman returns to his discussion of the schedule I would like to have him state to the committee whether in the dealings that he speaks of abroad the goods were simply the dumpings of American manufacturers or not, inasmuch as that is the usual answer that is given to the statements of fact that the gentleman has made.

Mr. REDFIELD. They were not any of them dumpings, and they were sold at regular prices.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. REDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I understand the gentleman has been able to sell his goods abroad on the same basis of price as that at which he sold them at home?

Mr. REDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That seems to be a very good result of the working policy of our administration. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. REDFIELD. And I propose, Mr. Chairman, if my time permits, to tell the reason why; and also why hundreds of my fellow manufacturers are doing the same thing. I want to take up then, Mr. Chairman, the things that have been omitted in this discussion. I wish to deal with the question of the cost of production—what it involves, what the elements in it are—and to go through it with some care.

But a few more illustrations may be interesting also. My agent in the city of Calcutta said to me, "Do you see those shoes?" I said, "Yes." He said, "I paid $3.85 for those shoes." "Why," I said, "that is an American shoe." "Yes," he said, "I bought it here. It is the regular American $5 shoe." I said, "Are you sure?" He said, "Yes." I wore them to New York and went into the store on Broadway where they are sold and asked what the price was there, and I was told it was their regular $5 shoe. I shall be glad to give names and addresses to any gentleman in the House who inquires in private.

I hold in my hand a little lead pencil. It is a small, ordinary pencil. It has upon it the name of the American Pencil Co., of New York. I bought it in the middle of Java, out of stock. I have in my home in Washington some men's toilet articles—shaving soap, and so forth, made in New Jersey. I bought them in Hongkong. I found them in stock in drug stores around the planet. Of course they are sent there as gifts. We all realize now that it is impossible to sell goods, made at American wages, abroad. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

And, Mr. Chairman, I have here an advertisement of a most peculiar kind. It is from the Drapers' Record, which is a leading textile paper of Great Britain. It is an advertisement of the Pacific Mills of Boston, United States of America. It is a whole page advertisement, and it reads:

Serpentine crepe is stocked by the largest retailers in Great Britain because the English public have found it is the greatest cotton crepe in the world.

It proceeds to enlarge upon it, and says:

By our extensive advertising in the leading British publications we are creating a very lively demand for serpentine crepe amongst a certain class of householders.

They proceed with a guarantee, and then state that their London agent is prepared to fill all orders for serpentine crepe. This is signed by the Pacific Mills, of Boston, Mass., giving the address of their agents not only for Great Britain but for Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, and other colonies.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. REDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. In his travels in the Orient did my colleague find that any of the oriental cotton mills were suffering from competition with American mills?

Mr. REDFIELD. I am very glad the gentleman asked that question, because the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut in his address upon the tariff said something about the low wages of labor and other conditions in the cotton mills of Osaka. I had recently the pleasure of being in the city of Osaka. My informant there was our own agent—a house that has nothing to do with cotton—he told me that the Osaka mills found it often difficult to compete with American mills. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On a main street of the city of Batavia is a very nice office building. It is one of the most creditable office buildings in Java, and over the door are these words, "United States Steel Products Co."

Now, of course, it is most thoughtful and kind of the United States Steel Products Co. to go there and build a useless building. We appreciate that thoroughly; but I had the impression that the United States Steel Products men, whatever else they were, were not fools. I would suggest to the committee investigating the United States Steel Corporation, to inquire as to whether one of their subsidiaries is giving away its product in the Dutch East Indies. Yet, after all, we are told that though foreign manufacturers are handicapped by distance, by time, and by freight, we can not compete with them because we pay high wages and they pay low wages.

Finally, to end what I was going to say in illustration, just let me read a list of 10 departments of one export journal stating the American goods that they are offering abroad, for sale in open competition, Mr. Chairman, with Germany and Great Britain. And at the risk of being a little bit wearisome, I think it may inform this House to know how completely we are unable to compete with the foreign manufacturer. I read, therefore, iron mongery, fine tools, bicycles, sporting goods, lamps, razors, firearms, carriage makers' supplies, sanitary goods, lighting systems, dry goods, men's furnishing goods, boots and shoes, corsets, hats and caps, textiles, clothing, women's furnishings, office furniture, office devices, stationery, typewriters, filing cabinets, printers' supplies, paper, machine tools—a friend in Rotterdam sold two that were made in New Jersey the other day when I was there—boilers, lubricants, electrical material, valves, woodworking machinery, belting, shafting, pulleys, packing, furniture, kitchenware, and so forth.

Mr. HARDY. Is the gentleman sure that razors are included in that list? I thought we had to have about 200 per cent duty to enable us to compete here in razors.

Mr. REDFIELD. If the gentleman will accompany me abroad, I shall be very glad to have him buy American razors out of stock at a number of points.

Mr. HARDY. Razors are in the gentleman's list, are they?

Mr. REDFIELD. Razors are here; also agricultural machinery. On that matter of agricultural machinery I am reminded of another thing.

Have any of my friends on this side of the House heard a gentleman on that side of the House mention or account for this particular fact, that there are manufacturing houses in America that sell no goods in the United States? They pay as high wages as anyone. There is one in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., making agricultural machinery. Another is in or near Newburgh, N. Y. There are many more; one in New York City.

And yet the feature of this discussion is the fear of foreign makers in American markets, ignoring the fact that foreign designs, foreign measurement, foreign methods are often such as to make their products useless here at any price.

The discussion, therefore, from a manufacturing standpoint has been of the most elementary character. It is assumed, without argument, that American manufacturers can not compete in the world's market on even terms without protection, and can not even hold their own at home. The only suggested way of meeting competition is by reducing wages, the crudest, the coarsest, and the most brutal of all methods. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The only form of competition that appears to be known is in the prices at which goods are sold, and yet some American goods selling widely abroad bring higher prices in Europe and other foreign markets than goods produced of the same kind in the markets where they are sold.

In Antwerp I was told by a gentleman that he could buy in Germany goods much cheaper than mine. I asked him to show them to me and I was given them. He told the price, which was about 20 per cent less than mine. I took them up, and at the point where the handle should have been fitted closely and carefully, I put the blade of my knife in and left it standing. I said to my Belgian friend, "Will you accept goods like that from me?" "Well," he said, "they are cheaper than yours." I said to him, "If you will accept goods like that from me I will make them 10 per cent less than the German price." "Oh," he said, "I can not."

The necessity therefore exists for a broader view of this whole subject which shall take into account facts that have not yet appeared, and to consider it from a practical rather than from a theoretical side.

Now, if there is one man, Mr. Chairman, in the world who can not afford to be deceived, it is the manufacturer. He is the last man that can afford to be deceived. His plant will eat its head off. He knows perfectly well that idle he loses more money than if he runs at a loss. His plant will eat its head off unless he keeps it moving at a profit. He is not easily deceived. He must face realities.

Now, let us consider, if you please, the cost of production from the manufacturers' standpoint. What is it and what does it involve and how shall it be handled? Unless I am mistaken, these gentlemen before me who are practitioners of the law will find that they have discovered a strictly professional problem in dealing with cost, an intricate and complex thing—not a thing which can be bitten off at a bite and called the rate of wages.

There are four groups that enter into every factory cost:

1. The cost of labor.
2. The cost of material.
3. Burden cost (or overhead charges).
4. Selling cost.

The aggregate of these four fixes the point per unit of product where profit begins. Let us discuss them separately.

First, labor cost. In a modern industry this is often not the largest element in cost per unit of their product. In some industries it is rarely the largest element in unit cost. In my own experience there have been many cases where had the labor cost equaled the other elements of cost per unit I should have thought my superintendent needed overhauling. I am told that in an American locomotive the percentage of labor cost is 20 and that the percentage of material cost and of burden and overhead charges is 80.

I was in a mill a few weeks ago not a thousand miles from New York. They were making a fabric, and I asked what the percentage of labor and material in it was. It is a material, gentlemen, that I have heard discussed upon the floor of this House as being one case where we must maintain the standard of American wages. This party said a change in the tariff would be disastrous, and yet he said that out of a dollar and a quarter selling price per pound the material and wastage cost was $1.05, and when I said to him, "You mean by that that you must pay your labor and carry your burden charge and make your profit out of 20 cents on a dollar and a quarter"? He said, "Yes."

Now, Mr. Chairman, it needs only the statement to show that the important factor in labor cost is not the rate of wage, but the rate of output. It is not what you pay, but what you get for what you pay that counts.

Once, when my office was located in the city of Paris, I employed a lot of French carpenters and paid them 10 francs a day—$1.90 each—and at the end of three or four days I was well-nigh crazy. Down the long aisle of the building I saw a familiar-looking tool box, with a saw sticking from the end, and I ran to the place and found a man who looked like an American carpenter. I said, "Are you a Yankee?" and he said, "Yes." I said, "I want to employ you now." He said, "Boss, I charge $4.50 a day." I said, "Come right along." Two days later I discharged four Frenchmen, and my one American carpenter did more work than the four Frenchmen. [Applause.] And I saved money by the process. And if somebody wants to ask me the question, there are sound, sober, serious reasons why the American carpenter did as much work as four Frenchmen, and I shall be very glad, if you wish to detain me, to go into the details of the reason why that man is so much more efficient.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Let us have the reasons.

Mr. REDFIELD. In employing a French carpenter, he goes to work having eaten almost nothing. For breakfast he has nothing more than a bit, a little bit, of bread, without butter, and coffee. At 11 o'clock he stops to eat a little bread and drink a little sour wine. That is all, all I ever saw any of them eat. At 3 o'clock he stops again to eat a little bread and drink a little sour wine. After he gets through at night he has what he calls a dinner. Such a man can never work at any labor requiring steady physical exertion continuously under pressure in competition with a man who eats three square meals a day. [Laughter and applause.]

I speak from some knowledge of French factories, and also of German factories, but I would like my friends on the other side to explain the folly of the Englishman who once asked me to go into his factory and tell him how to cut down his labor cost. What a fool that Englishman must have been! Yet I might pause right there to tell what I found at that particular time in that English factory as another reason why they can not compete with us.

A MEMBER. Tell us.

Mr. REDFIELD. The first machines I found in the factory I recommended be thrown into the scrap heap. That is characteristic. I went upstairs and found a screw machine making bolts of various sizes, and a boy running it at a very small wage, probably about 2 shillings a day.

I stood looking at the boy, and its product, first, twenty ¼-inch bolts, and then twenty-five ½-inch bolts, and then fifty ¾-inch bolts, and then five or six 1-inch bolts, and then back to quarter inch. I went to the superintendent and said to him, "Mr. So-and-So, that boy is costing you more than a man who earns $3 a day would in one of our shops." He said, "Why?" I said, "Twenty-five per cent of his time is used in altering tools. He is 'breaking up,' as we say, altering his machine from time to time and stopping his processes 10 to 15 times a day." He said, "What would you do?" I said, "Give him one size and let him run all day on that. The next morning give him another size and let him run all day on that, and the next morning give him another size; do not stop your machines, but run them steadily on one size." "Why," he said, "Mr. REDFIELD, we can not get foremen to think that out." I shall be glad to give the name, place, and date to anybody who inquires.

Mr. McMORRAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. REDFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. McMORRAN. I assume from your description you have recently made a trip around the world.

Mr. REDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. McMORRAN. Will you state to the House here how many American ships you found under the American flag?

Mr. REDFIELD. I shall be glad to discuss that question. I have already put it in writing. The last American ship I saw was in Hongkong. After that I saw two ships bearing the flag of Sarawak, and three bearing the flag of Greece, but none bearing the flag of America until I got to New York.

Mr. McMORRAN. Were you especially proud of the fact?

Mr. REDFIELD. No; I am ashamed of it.

Mr. McMORRAN. Now, if the gentleman will permit another question, because I understand you are getting the same price abroad you are getting at home——

Mr. REDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. McMORRAN. Do I understand you can ship from one of your factories at Detroit, Mich., to Hongkong and China at the same cost you can ship from Detroit to points in Michigan?

Mr. REDFIELD. You mean transportation cost?

Mr. McMORRAN. I mean transportation cost.

Mr. REDFIELD. Certainly not.

Mr. McMORRAN. Then if you get the same price from the foreign buyer that you do from the American buyer are not you discriminating against the American buyer?

Mr. REDFIELD. Goods for foreign markets are sold f. a. s. New York—free alongside ship, New York—and the question of transportation is always for the foreign buyer as it is for the American buyer. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The foreigner pays that freight. Goods are sold f. o. b. Detroit for San Diego, or Portland, Me., or Indianapolis, Ind. There is no serious injustice in that; it is understood.

Mr. McMORRAN. Are you certain you are selling the engines that you manufacture in Detroit at the same price in Michigan you are abroad?

Mr. REDFIELD. It is a fraction or two higher abroad. I will be glad to give the exact discount list to the gentleman in private.

Mr. McMORRAN. I will state I bought some of your engines——

Mr. REDFIELD. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. McMORRAN. And I have some knowledge of them, and I assume that a great deal of the success of your institution is due to the most excellent ability you have in connection with your salesmen.

Mr. REDFIELD. I thank you; but I have only been with that concern for a few years.

Mr. McMORRAN. That enables you to get better prices than the other salesmen get.

Mr. REDFIELD. No; most of the business matters I have spoken of, it is only fair to say, have no relation with that particular concern, but with another one. I have been selling goods abroad for the last 18 years.

Mr. McMORRAN. I desire to ask the gentleman another question. Have you any suggestion now as how to cure the evil of foreign ships carrying American products?

Mr. REDFIELD. Yes, indeed. I shall be glad at some future time to address this House on that particular subject of the merchant marine, as it is a subject to which I feel very keenly, if the House desires it, but I do not care to mix up the cost of production with it now, it being an entirely separate matter. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I have just stated in the matter of labor cost the serious element is not the rate of wage, but the rate of output. For example, in competing with a Swedish concern at one time it was inquired how it was practicable so to do.

I said, "How much does he produce?" "Four hundred a day." I said, "Our output is twenty-eight hundred a day." One of the things, gentlemen, I would like to burn into your thought is this—the essentially variable quality of cost. It can not be talked about as a fixed thing. Cost is everywhere and always variable, at every time and in every place.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. If my colleague will pardon me, does he believe the difference in the cost of production here and abroad is a practical way of fixing the tariff rate?

Mr. REDFIELD. If the gentleman permit, I will later answer that question squarely and directly.

Output varies with the character of the workmen, the equipment, its arrangement, or other local conditions, with the nature of the superintendence, with the discipline, and so forth. It is absurd to assume that work done by a man paid $4 daily costs more per annum than work done by a man paid $2 daily. It may be more or less costly, and depends upon other conditions. Therefore, because certain goods are produced at a certain labor cost per unit when the wage rate is $3 per day in a certain place, it can never be argued that the same wage rate on similar goods results in a like labor cost per unit in another place. It may vary from 10 to 50 per cent. To discuss the wage rate as the controlling factor in labor cost per unit is both inadequate and misleading. The railroads are a very notable example of this. The English railways have vastly cheaper labor than we, but their freight charge per ton-mile is two and one-half times ours. With pride the Indian railway department told this last winter that, though their labor is one-eighth of ours in cost per day, they had succeeded in getting down to a trifle lower freight cost per ton-mile than we. They had been years at it, with labor one-eighth of ours, and had just succeeded.

I have in my hand a letter from my own representative in Rangoon, saying, "Figure on an apparatus using native labor cheap but bad." To say a man gets $3 per day means nothing at all as to the cost of his product. It may be either low or high, and the wage rate taken by itself alone affords no basis of comparison. Apart from the wage rate, labor cost per unit is very largely under the control of the manufacturer and may be radically altered without changing the wage rate.

Now, there is a question as to a manufacturer's own control of his labor cost apart from the wage rate that I want to illustrate by three examples.

In a large factory in the State of Illinois the superintendent had 100 milling machines in one room—a room very much like this. They were all arranged facing one way, and he stood at the end of the room one day and saw the men were walking useless miles in getting back and forth to feed the machines as they ran out of stock. And he planned how he should eliminate that useless cost of walking—time paid, as he said to me, for walking matches. Finally, he took his 100 machines and turned them face to face, so that the man passing between them had a machine on either hand. He divided the machines into four groups, one in each corner of the room. He cut down the walking distance 15 miles a day [applause], and he saved two men's labor, or a saving of 25 per cent of his labor, without altering anything except the arrangement of his machines.

The next illustration is this: I know a factory in which the product was doubled in two years without adding a man or without adding a machine. And this is the way it was done: It is a very interesting experience in labor cost. The men had been paid on day work. The labor men have, and they properly have, a horror of piecework, as it is commonly administered, because, I am sorry to say, manufacturers have so abused the piecework principle that the laboring men have justly come to fear it. [Applause.] As piecework is handled in most factories it ought to be hated, as it is hated, but in this particular factory the head of the concern got the idea that he could save by guaranteeing his men a high wage. That is queer doctrine for the other side of the House. He got the idea in his head that he could save by paying a high wage, and he said—and I speak of it because I was called into consultation at the time—"We will guarantee your day rates; you shall always earn your present day's pay. We will also guarantee that, no matter what you earn, your piecework rates shall not be cut. We will agree with one another that obvious mistakes will be corrected either way, but if you earn large pay, understand, your piecework rate shall not be cut, no matter what you earn."

That was true. That factory operated upon that basis for many years. The wages of some men went up to $6, and in some odd cases even to $7 a day. I had the pleasure of selling some of the product of this shop abroad, against European competition.

Now, when the men were guaranteed an unlimited earning rate, see what happened? The manufacturer said, "There is the machine. There is your power. Go ahead. Earn all you can, and God bless you." [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, from the manufacturer's side naturally the first result of that was largely to increase the product. Then three other things happened. The manufacturer went one day to a man and said to him, "Pat, you are earning pretty good wages. It does not make any difference to me what you earn. The more you earn the better for us both. But there is one thing you can not afford, and that is to have your machine shut down for repairs. It hurts me, and it hurts you every hour that that machine is idle, and your machine is of that particular kind and engaged in that particular work that knocks the machine to pieces if it is not properly taken care of. Every hour it is delayed in operation it hurts both you and me." Says Pat, "What is it that you want?" "I want you to spend about 15 minutes before work starts every morning in overhauling that machine in your own interest. Do not let it get into such shape that it will need repairs."

Gentlemen, I can not tell you the exact number of thousands of dollars per annum that was saved in that factory in that simple way, but it was several times $10,000 a year, just that item of examining carefully the machines every morning before beginning regular operations.

In the next place the system of using fuel had been more or less careless in this shop. The manufacturer went to his workmen and said to them, "Boys, you are not going to be cut, no matter what you earn. You can not afford to waste time in firing improperly. You must be careful." His men did as instructed. At the end of three or four weeks about an hour and a quarter's time was saved each day, amounting to one-eighth of the operating time of that part of the plant, besides a saving of fuel.

Now, in most factories the element of defective goods is a large element of cost. It may be a very large element of cost where you are making goods, as some factories do, measured to the thousandth of an inch. This manufacturer went to his men and said, "Boys, you are well paid. There is no limit, practically, to what you can earn. Go ahead and earn what you can. But it is not fair on that basis to make any bad goods." The men thought the matter over among themselves, and finally they came to him and said, "What is it you want?" and he said, "I want you to replace the bad goods in your own time and to replace the material that you waste." And right there was saved several thousand dollars more in the course of a year.

In those three little ways, without touching the rate of wage, the output of that factory went up double in two years; and the same thing, to a greater or less degree, depending upon different circumstances, is possible everywhere. But some one will say about the case I have quoted that there must have been lax management theretofore. I can assure him that was not the case.

I met an American leather manufacturer while abroad. He had some English visitors come into his plant, and showed them how he was making a hundred dozen of a certain kind of skin per day—that is, doing a certain operation on that many per day—and they said to him: "That is very good, indeed; very good, indeed; better than we do, and we are very much pleased with it." But he did not tell them that he had just bought a machine, which would take the place of the one that he showed them, that did 300 dozen a day. And when a few years later he went to see them in Great Britain and found they had risen to his standard of 100 dozen a day, he did not tell them then that he had put in another machine that made the process 600 dozen a day.

Labor cost per unit varies with time and place, and in the same shop is constantly changing. It is unlike in each of several mills producing the same goods, belonging to the same company. A superintendent who would take three mills making the same goods, under the same ownership, in three different cities, and get the cost alike would be a wonder. I should greatly like to know where such men could be had. For example, I have in mind two factories, belonging to the same concern, where for two years it has been a constant effort to get the costs alike in making the same goods. But what are you going to do when in one factory power costs three times as much as it does in the other?

Labor cost is affected by sanitary and by climatic conditions. It varies with the quantity and the quality of the output, and it can never be assumed that it is at the close of the year what it was at the beginning of the year in the same shop. It is enormously modified by the progress of invention. The labor cost in your shop in January may be in some respects entirely wiped out by July. The labor cost in July may be entirely altered by December; else what is your purchasing agent for, and for what purpose are you feeling out all over the world for the latest machinery? Base a tax upon the January cost, that is just equal to the difference in foreign cost, if there be such a thing, and it is altogether altered by July, and by December it may be three times the difference. And every manufacturer knows these things and lives up to them every day, but does not always talk about them in public. [Applause and laughter.]

Labor cost varies with the arrangement of machinery within the shop. It is affected by the space available. It varies with the changes in material, with the sufficiency and the regularity of the supply of material and its suitability to the work. And the labor cost of Monday when the stock runs out Monday afternoon and new stock comes in Tuesday is not the same on Tuesday that it was on Monday. The steel mill may have made an error and your labor cost go flying up for the time being. And I am speaking now, gentlemen, from an experience in figuring labor costs to hundredths of a cent per unit.

Labor cost is affected by the lighting and the power equipment of the shop, and will change with the going of one superintendent and the coming of another. I am sure before this audience I need only to say these things one after the other to have their entire reasonableness made plain to you all.

Labor cost will alter radically within a month, by the introduction of new tools, new machinery, or the change of a process, even to the extent of having a whole process eliminated. It varies with the wastefulness of material used in producing an article, excessive use of supplies, the loss of time and material occasioned in making defective goods; and every one of these items has to be strictly and carefully watched by any alert manufacturer.

The labor cost is affected by methods of paying (by piecework on a righteous basis, and by day's work on an unrighteous basis) and by a just and considerate application of the methods of paying apart from the amount paid.

Labor cost is, therefore, a variable element. It can not be measured by any fixed standard. To offer a fixed rate of duty to cover the difference in labor cost is first of all to state an absurdity, for the one is variable and the other is always fixed.

But labor cost in any factory is both direct and indirect, as will be made plain; upon the proper adjustment of one to the other depends in a degree the labor cost.

Reaffirming, therefore, that in many industries the unit cost of labor is not the largest element of the total unit cost, but may be a small percentage thereof, we pass to consider the cost of material. This is the most fixed of all the elements of cost, but only a little thought is needed to show that this, too, is variable. In two shops, one buying in large quantities and the other small quantities of the same goods, the price of the material will vary. In two large shops which buy the same quantity, but have buyers of different skill and differing in amount of free capital with which to purchase, the cost will vary. In two shops in the same business, but located differently with respect to transportation, the cost will vary. Within the shops the cost of material will vary with the handling facilities provided and with the space available for storage. The cost of material will vary with the system of receiving the same and storing them. The cost of material must always include such important and such variable items as freight, cartage, wharfage, demurrage, and the like.

The cost of material must always include the wages of the storekeeper and a share of rental for the space occupied by it. The cost of material will vary also with such depreciation as will take place if it is not protected against loss. This, therefore, though relatively a fixed quantity, is variable, so that in different shops, in the same line of business, it can not be argued that the net material cost in one even approximates that in another.

The cost of material must include the factory supplies, the purchase, keeping, management of which is an important and complex element of cost where thousands may easily go out of sight. Consider what it may mean to have one purchase of bad lubricating oil. Its use on valuable and delicate machinery may cause the loss of thousands of dollars in a single week.

But when the variable items of unit cost of labor and material are combined you have only obtained what is known as prime cost, or actual outlay, and have still to consider two of the most serious elements in cost, each of which sometimes amounts to a larger total than either labor or material, and sometimes exceeds them both.

We therefore take up, third, cost of burden or overhead charges. This is often ignored or not appreciated at true value. More concerns are wrecked by failure to estimate or manage it properly than by any other single cause save perhaps insufficient capital.

I have in mind a factory in which I was employed and where I could not persuade my employer that a certain machine which was selling for $8,000 was in reality costing $9,000.

He thought he knew. He said, "I have been in this business 30 years, and I ought to know my own business"; and to a question as to how he carried his costs he said he kept them in his head, with that result. He insisted that his burden charge was 10 per cent, whereas, as a matter of fact, it was nearer 80 per cent, and it became me very speedily to find other employment, and at the end of two years that concern failed.

Among the items covered in burden cost are such as these: Taxes and assessments, repairs to buildings and machinery, indirect labor, superintendence, experiments, insurance and fire protection—two different things—depreciation, bad debts, accidents, interest and discounts, power, heat, and light, and legal expenses, every one of them matters which everybody knows, every one of them matters needing the most careful attention, if they are to be kept within reasonable limits.

A large concern located on expensive land in a city with high rates of assessment and taxes may bear a burden in this single respect enough to pay a profit on the entire investment of a small concern more favorably placed; but, as showing the complex nature of this problem, the same concern may, by reason of its equipment and its efficient organization, produce goods, though paying the same or higher wages, so cheaply as to overcome this handicap.

Repairs vary with the character of the buildings, their age, their location, with climate, and with respect to machinery, with the care given to it. In some industries this item of repairs is very large.

Indirect labor is an unfortunate necessity in every industry. A cotton mill employs carpenters and steam fitters, whose presence is necessary, but whose expense is a burden on the output. Every modern shop has to have a tool room. This question of indirect cost is often a very serious one, and is a matter requiring the closest professional study.

The cost of superintendence is apt to be heavy in proportion as the labor is cheap. I was very much interested in what the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] said about the jute mills in Calcutta in his recent address, because only eight weeks ago I was in those jute mills talking with the superintendent. I find it a very excellent plan, if you wish to get at the details of a factory, to avoid the owner. [Laughter and applause.] Get at the practical superintendent and you will learn more in an hour than you will from the owner in three weeks. I asked this gentleman in this large jute mill about the question of his labor. He said it was cheap, very cheap. I said, "Is it wasteful?" He answered, "Extremely wasteful." I asked him in what other respect it was bad, and he said it was bad in the respect that it required an unusual amount of European superintendence—three to four times as much as they would give in Scotland.

Experiments looking toward new or better output, tools, or machines are a very expensive item in many factories. It is hardly necessary to say that insurance varies. An old wooden mill must charge the cost of its output with many times the unit cost for insurance that is borne by goods produced in modern so-called slow-burning buildings. The actual loss from fires, over and above that covered by insurance, is a part of the burden cost frequently forgotten and of uncertain amount, but often serious. Depreciation is a large item of cost, amounting often to as much as 10 per cent per annum of the entire value of the machinery, buildings, and other equipment, varying with conditions. Sometimes neglected by manufacturers, it forms a burden of a self-enforcing character, which, if not reckoned as an annual addition to the burden cost, will come in a lump sum whenever machinery or buildings must be replaced. The loss arising through machinery thrown out of date by new inventions is a serious part of burden cost frequently forgotten. The loss arising from the continued use of antiquated and slow-producing apparatus is another large part of burden cost. It is not confined to England, although that is its great exemplar, and here I want, if I may, to tell an incident or two.

Some few years ago I visited a large English engineering shop, and to my horror discovered an old-fashioned single cylinder walking-beam engine being built. I asked what that was for, and they said it was for a cotton mill in Oldham. Alongside of that they were building several modern triple-expansion engines. I said, "Why is that old type being built; it is 50 years behind the times." He said, "Simply because the owner said his father had one like it, and he wanted the same thing." I once sold a large order of goods to a concern in the city of Leeds, in England. That was a very absurd thing to do, because Leeds is a great industrial town. It was, of course, another case of our benevolence, but they bought the goods. When I came to the question of the allowance for finishing on the goods I said, "How much shall I allow on each surface for finishing?" "Oh," they said, "one-eighth of an inch." I said, "Our usual practice is one thirty-second." They said, "Mr. REDFIELD, I wish you would be serious." I said, "I am entirely serious. You have bought here a modern American plant of machinery." That is quite a European habit. It is rather ignored here, but it is quite the habit in Europe to buy American machinery, and I should be very much pleased to take some of you gentlemen to see half a dozen, some in Germany and some in England. I said, "You have got this fine plant of American machinery. You are now proposing to require of it four times the amount of work that it was built to do, or else run it far below its normal speed." "Well," they said, "that is our custom and practice," and therefore because of that custom it required four times the machining work to finish those goods that we put on them in America.

This question of slow-producing apparatus is sometimes by itself alone very serious. I recall one large sugar refinery in New York City that closed on that account alone. I recall another where the single item of cartage was so great they had to go out of business. I recall three woolen mills that stood idle for years because their machinery was out of date and they would not replace it, and another that was idle and stood idle because it was three miles from a railroad and the cartage killed it. Those are the things that do it, and not the difference in the wage rate. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The losses from accident are a constant terror to every manufacturer, and yet I stood, within the last few weeks, in a factory claiming high protection at our hands here, which could have made a profit by saving in handling charges alone, but which stood to lose—for lack of care for human flesh and blood, and because of failure to properly protect its machinery—thousands of dollars every year. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman desire more time? If so, I will yield him such further time as he desires. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REDFIELD. The loss arising from bad accounts is present in every business, and varies with the care in selling goods.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. REDFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY. The point made by the gentleman seems to me to apply with equal force to the late ruling of our Interstate Commerce Commission holding that these subsidiary companies, some of the great shipping companies, may have their rake-off after delivery while other companies are not given the same amount of saving, and thereby destroy the minor companies.

Mr. REDFIELD. That is quite true. The burden of the charge arising from interest and discounts varies with the amount of free capital available in the business. I do not refer to the interest upon bonds or the interest on the total investment, with which some concerns charge themselves as an expense, but rather the interest that is to be paid upon real-estate mortgages and upon money borrowed to supply working capital and for discounts allowed customers for prepayment.

Power, heat, and light vary greatly. In two large shops known to me and belonging to the same concern, operating on the same class of goods, on this single item there is a difference of 300 per cent. The source of power is so variable that no general statement can be made. For example, power from water, from steam, from electricity, or from gas engines. I am interested in two concerns using electric power largely. One pays 5 cents per kilowatt hour, taking it from steam; the other 1½ cents a kilowatt hour, taking it from water, a difference of over 300 per cent in the power rate.

It will be seen that the item of burden cost is one of importance and difficult to define. It is one in which every manufacturer is very closely interested, because it very often affects the cost of his production far more than the rate of wages that he pays. Manufacturers, however, are very apt to assume the burden cost to be less than it is. Instead of making a careful study of it, they take what seems to be the obvious course, of reducing the pay roll, instead of the more economical course of studying closely their burden charges. Once my partner said to me, "Although your department of this business is not the factory, I want you to go into it every day for an hour or two, simply to find what is wrong." And for 10 years I never went a day that I did not find something that could be bettered. Before a manufacturer comes to you, gentlemen on this side of the House, claiming the right to have you tax this whole people for his benefit, he should show affirmatively facts to the effect that his methods are the best that are known. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McCOY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. REDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. McCOY. If the gentleman is willing, I would like to have him tell his experience with a gentleman from a Pittsburg steel company sometime ago.

Mr. REDFIELD. I will be glad to do it. When a tariff bill was pending, Mr. Chairman, some years ago, a representative of a crucible-steel works in Pittsburg came into my office and said, "I have a petition I would like to have you sign." I said, "What is it?" He replied, "It is a petition to have the duty upon our product advanced." I asked him why. I ought, perhaps, to explain, Mr. Chairman, that manufacturers have talked very freely with me for many years, assuming, as a matter of course, that I agreed with them in their particular views, and this man went on to say in answer to my question as to why they wanted this additional duty: "We have got to keep the standard of American living; we have got to hold up the American rate of wages and see that our American working people live on a basis far better than the pauper labor of Europe." I said, "That is very interesting. How much of the proposed increase do you propose to add to your pay roll?" He said they had not yet given that serious consideration. [Laughter.] I asked him if he would add any portion of this increased duty to the pay roll, and he replied that they had not got to that yet. I said to him, "I have already signed a petition to have our duty reduced, but if you will enter into a contract with me here and now that within a year after the duty is increased you will add any percentage to your pay roll, then I will recall my petition and sign yours and publish the facts." He said, "You could not expect me to do that." [Laughter.] I said to him, "Now, Mr. So-and-so"—I knew him very well—I said, "Now, Mr. So-and-so, you are paying 10 per cent, are you not?" He said he was. I then asked him if his desire was not simply to pay a little better than 10 per cent. He said, "Well, Mr. REDFIELD, you know how these things go." [Laughter.]

The reduction of wage rate is always an expensive process, involves serious, unseen, but real losses. I invite the gentlemen to go to the Library of Congress and take out a little book entitled "Cost Reduction," in which you will not find the suggestion made of reducing cost by altering the rate of wages.

Who shall calculate accurately the difference in labor cost in a large factory between the output of a force of, say, 1,000 mechanics, well paid, well equipped, well housed, with ample light and power, with machinery well arranged, with material exactly suited to their purposes, with management that wins the loyalty and enthusiasm of the men by liberal pay and just treatment, and the output of an equal force of men working in poor light, with variable, insufficient power, poor equipment, with wages cut to the smallest limit, with improper sanitary conditions, and harsh treatment? [Applause.]

The difference between the output under above conditions may be the difference between ruin and dividends. You can not confine human nature within the limits of a wage rate. Wholly outside of the rate of pay there is unlimited scope for brains in manufacturing. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But in all this we have merely produced our goods and laid them at the factory door. They are not yet sold, and before their sale takes place another serious element of cost must be added. Therefore we must discuss selling expense. This selling expense is sometimes as large as the entire cost of labor, material, and burden.

I have only to mention to you what it costs to sell automobiles in order to get your immediate assent to that. Selling cost includes such items as traveling expenses, commissions, advertising, office salaries and rental, postage and stationery, packing and shipping expense, office equipment, office heat and light, and similar items. I need only mention these to show at once that they are of a very variable character. In some lines the cost of advertising alone is equal to the combined cost of all things else put together. In some industries traveling expenses are a very heavy item. Office expenses are very high in other industries, and in others office expenses might well be greater if they would so insure the ascertainment and reduction of burden cost. Some time ago a manufacturer claiming to need protection told me, in answer to the question, "Do you keep your costs accurately?" "I carry them in my head." He said, "I have been thinking for some time of putting in a cost-keeping system. It would cost about $4,000 to install the system, and I have not yet seen my way clear to it." I said to him, "Do you know whether that room or this room or the other room pays you a profit or costs you a loss?" He said, "No." I said, "How can you economize if you can not tell that? How can you know where to economize?" And yet he has the cheek to expect us to vote to tax the people in order that he may make a profit. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In one concern well known to me the burden and selling costs were double that of material and labor, and labor was least of all. Misleading and inaccurate statements frequently arise from lack of accurate accounting and cost keeping. Manufacturers are frequently ignorant of their own costs. I know of one so ignorant of his own business that he had $400,000 stolen from him, Mr. Chairman, and yet he did not know it. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] I would be very glad to give the name and place to anybody who may be interested to inquire. Manufacturers have been often seeking the cheap rather than the economical. Cost is often assumed to be in labor where it is actually consumed in burden, or valuable by-products are neglected that would carry the burden of cost in whole or in part.

And right there I had an interesting experience with a large concern in Connecticut. We had to make in our business a certain kind of scrap material, for which I could find no satisfactory market. I sold it, but I could not get enough for it. I was satisfied that somewhere in this wide country there were consumers who wanted that sort of thing and would pay for it. So I wrote to the largest concern of its kind, a house in Connecticut, making the same kind of scrap, whose output was 100 to my 1. I said to him, "How do you dispose of your scrap?" He said, "I have it wheeled out and dumped in my back yard." But four months' study of that scrap pile on our part enabled us to raise this price from $7 to $15 a ton. The other man did not study it. He could cry for protection, but he did not study his scrap heap. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

From the above, if you have been so kind as to follow me closely, I think it will be obvious that no assumption can ever be made that in order to reduce cost, wages need be touched. On the contrary, the field for saving outside of wages, and for the economical use of the funds spent in wages, is so large as to tax the powers of the human mind.

There are four whole classes of cost, each comprising numerous important items, that should be studied carefully before the question of reducing wages is so much as thought of.

I am going to speak in a few minutes, if you will allow me so long, of three things that I am sure have never been mentioned here—hidden reserves, compounded duties, and double incomes. They are rather abstruse, but extremely illuminating things, and I am led to think of them by the fact that I have not yet mentioned the serious element in cost called officers' salaries. Did you ever hear the proposition laid down that if the pay roll was cut the officers' salaries should be cut in proportion? And is it not perfectly sound that since the margin of living is narrower for the workman, the man who has the broader margin should be cut first and most? [Applause.] It would seem perfectly obvious.

I have touched but lightly upon the abuse of the piecework system, but I know one factory where five times the rate was cut lest the men earn too much. I say, gentlemen, it is an absolutely sound principle that he who comes before the Ways and Means Committee of this House claiming the use of the taxing power in his behalf shall come, in this and in all respects, with clean hands. [Applause.]

Since it is clear that cost is a large and complex subject, of which the item of labor forms but one, and often a minor part, and that cost is fluctuating and variable, it follows that no tax can be laid which will in different places and at different times always cover the difference in cost between foreign and domestic producers.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Does the gentleman mean by "cost of labor" the Republican phrase "cost of production"?

Mr. REDFIELD. I will repeat it. I think it will be then clear. Since it is clear that the cost of production is a large and complex subject, of which the item of labor forms but one, and often a minor part, and that cost is fluctuating and variable, it follows that no tax can be laid which will in different places and at different times always cover the difference in cost between foreign and domestic producers. [Applause.]

Mr. McCOY. Assuming that there is any.

Mr. REDFIELD. There is no such fixed difference in cost between foreign and domestic producers. There is not, and there never can be, such a thing as fixity of cost. To attain fixity of cost in a factory is industrial tuberculosis, and means death. The moment one reaches the point where he can not produce his goods any cheaper he should close his doors or go to an insane asylum, or sell out to some man who has brains. [Applause.]

The difference—mark it well, gentlemen; I know from practical experience it is true—the difference between three domestic concerns in labor cost may be as great, or even greater, than the difference between foreign and domestic concerns in the same line. The attempt to adjust a tariff rate to cover such a difference is therefore absurd. If it provides for the difference in the cost of foreign goods and of American goods made in an American factory where those goods are expensively made, it would provide an enormous bonus for an American manufacturer who made his goods economically. If it provides for the difference between foreign cost and American cost for goods made in the most efficient American mill, it will not protect at all the American maker whose cost is high. You may have an injustice done one American manufacturer or an enormous profit paid to another, and you can not avoid it. It is in the nature of things. No law can get at it. And if your proposed duty provides for the average foreign cost—an impossible thing to learn—it does not provide, therefore, for the skillful and economical exceptions among foreign manufacturers.

How in God's name, gentlemen, shall anybody ever learn the foreign cost of articles? Has any Ways and Means Committee in this House ever had brought before it the actual cost sheets of an American factory? They are the core and kernel of the manufacturer's business. He would not dare to produce them here lest his competitor find them out, but were they here produced this little theory and contention about the difference in cost between goods at home and abroad would oftentimes be found to be in favor of the United States manufacturer. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Does anyone of you suppose that that advertisement of the Pacific mills in Lowell, Mass., was published in an English paper for fun? And if it was not published for fun in an English paper, how is it that the Pacific mills can sell against English makers in their own country? This sort of a thing makes me a little tired. [Laughter.]

There exists, therefore, in the difference of cost no possible basis for a tariff tax. Many general statements have been made by American manufacturers respecting the disastrous effects of lower duties on their business, but how many of them ever brought their cost sheets into the light? It is not what the manufacturer says he can do, but what he does do. What does his cost account show? The only way I know to make a Tariff Commission worth anything is to give it the power to bring the cost sheets before it [applause on the Democratic side], and if that be done can you see and hear the howls that would go up from the manufacturers of the country?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. REDFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman explain how it is possible to give a Tariff Commission power to bring the foreign cost sheets before it?

Mr. REDFIELD. It can not be done. There is no way known to me—and I may say it has been my duty to strive for years to find out—there is no way known to me to get at the real cost of producing a thing in Germany, France, or any foreign country. When, if ever, was there a man who could suggest a method whereby you could inquire into the business of a foreign concern or whereby the facts concerning the inner details of its operation could be brought to light in this country? It is a perfectly absurd thing on its face, and I say it can not be done.

How many American manufacturers are willing to have their methods of production and cost accounts openly analyzed to show whether or not they could produce goods cheaper than a foreign competitor? There is no reason for taxing the whole American people because either manufacturers are lacking in scientific study of their own business or unwilling to let the facts come out.

The talk of the rate of wages as fixing the cost of production ought to end as being hopelessly ignorant and unscientific. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The following may be safely affirmed: First, the rate of wages is not always, perhaps not usually, the controlling element in cost. Second, competition is not always, sometimes not at all, a matter of selling price. It is often a matter of quality, often a matter of design, and often a matter of suitability. I know of a machine manufactured in this country—an engine—that sells for $87.50. In our factory we manufacture an engine of the same size that we sell for $350. How is it that our competitor does not get all the business?

Third, the cost of production is more influenced by rate of output and its quality than by rate of wage or hours of labor.

About 12 years ago the head of a concern in Brooklyn decided that he would put his factory voluntarily on a 9-hour-a-day basis. He became satisfied that there was an element in the 10-hour day that was real, but difficult to see, namely, the "tired" hour. He became satisfied that the tenth hour was the "tired" hour—that at that time the point was reached under which a man could not work to the highest advantage. He put his factory on the 9-hour-a-day basis, and kept a very careful record of his cost. At the end of the year it was 4 per cent to the good; he made an absolutely larger product. [Applause.]

Mr. McCOY. And the wages remained the same?

Mr. REDFIELD. The wages remained the same. I presume you gentlemen are all aware of the experiment that took place in the great shipbuilding yards of William Denny & Sons, who, as a result of conferences between them and their workmen, agreed that they would try the eight-hour day for a year, at the end of which time if the results showed no disadvantage to earnings in the eight-hour day it would be retained, otherwise the men agreed to go back to the nine-hour day. As a result, at the end of the year they retained the eight-hour day, because it paid. [Applause.] I do not mean to argue from this that you could go with an ax and cut everything arbitrarily to eight hours, but that the proper and reasonable adjustment of things to that will some day obtain is unquestioned. [Applause.]

Given scientific management, constant and careful study of operations and details of cost—and I am going to read that again if I may, for I think this is the crux of the whole question—given scientific management, constant and careful study of operations and details of cost, modern buildings and equipment, proper arrangement of plant and proper material, ample power, space, and light, a high wage rate means inevitably a low labor cost per unit of profit and the minimum of labor cost. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I saw them driving piles in Japan. Twenty women, each with a rope, lifted the pile. They were paid 20 cents a day in our money. I got a friend whose business was making pile drivers in New York to look at it, and we figured the cost of the piles. They cost four times as much to drive as it cost to drive them in New York. I could keep you here all day long with examples of the same kind. I was in a brickyard in Singapore, where I carefully calculated the product of the men. Their rate of pay was 35 cents a day in our money. I happened to have in my pocket a very accurate cost statement of a brick-making company in one of our eastern cities, signed by its president, and when the superintendent of the Singapore yard and I figured his labor cost together they were precisely the same. A steadily decreasing labor cost per unit of product is not inconsistent with, but is normal to, a coincident advance in the rate of pay for the work when accompanied with careful study of methods and equipment, as last suggested. Now, these principles have stood the test, gentlemen, of two panics and of a single year when we lost 35 per cent of all our business at one stroke, because the industry that gave it to us collapsed. It went almost out of existence, and new business had to be found from some other place. Yet no man's wages were cut.

I repeat, a steadily decreasing labor cost per unit of product is not inconsistent with, but on the contrary is normal to, a coincident advance in the rate of pay for the work when accompanied by careful study of methods and equipment, as previously suggested. Conversely, low-priced labor nearly always is costly per unit produced, and usually is inconsistent with good tools, equipment, and large and fine product, else such labor would not be low-priced. Now, I do not care to multiply illustration after illustration, but I have notes of several others that can be given.

Now, let us ask one single question which our friends on the other side will be sure to ask you if I stop right there, and that is, Are not foreign manufacturers as well placed as American manufacturers, save in the single exception of wages? You are bound to face that question. Are they not as well placed as we, save in the single exception of wages? To ask that question, however, is to answer it in the minds of all familiar with the details of the facts. The answer can only be in the negative. It is claimed that foreign labor is as efficient as American labor. I have a letter from the head of a great Japanese cotton mill, in which he is said to figure, when making plans for heating his mill, upon there being from three to four times the number of employees for the same number of looms that there are in an American mill.

I visited a rubber factory in Singapore where the superintendent, a Frenchman, told me it took five Malays to do one Frenchman's work. In an English shop I saw five men pushing a truck to move, say, 400 pounds, for which they were paid $1.25 each, or $6.25 total, and an American manufacturer who was with me shrugged his shoulders when he saw it and said he would have a small crane and a man at $3.50 a day to run it. It is not claimed that the European labor is of as high morale and personnel as American, and here I want to tell you two remarkable stories, one of which, at least, is typical.

In a large shop in England, where I spent 10 days in a factory, there was one young man seemed to me very industrious. I said to his employer, "Why do not you raise his pay; I think he is worth it." He said, "I can not." I said, "Can not; what do you mean?" "Well," he said, "he will not let me raise his pay. That man earns 2 pounds a week—$10. I have offered him 10 shillings extra, and each time he lays off just enough to make his 2 pounds a week." [Laughter.] The point I want to make to you gentlemen is that this is typical, and that if you are running a factory in Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, Glasgow, Oldham, you would have to deal with men whose pay you can not raise. They will not accept it; they do not want more pay. You are up against a condition there we know nothing about here. Now, secondly. A large European manufacturer said to me, "Mr. REDFIELD, what allowance do you make in your factory for loss of time from drink?" I said, "None." "Oh," he said, "do be serious." I said, "I am perfectly serious." "Well," he said, "I know your workmen drink." I said, "They do; but no self-respecting American mechanic will work at the bench permanently alongside a drunkard." Now, that is true of our American mechanics. You take the first-class mechanics in this country and they will not keep in a shop the man who is habitually a drunkard; they will freeze him out. You can not conceive such a thing as his remaining. In fact, the superintendent would not have him in the place. Now, have you ever figured out the loss of time in an English factory from drink, which has to be endured?

I learn on information and belief, and my observation at least confirms it, that there is a regular loss in Birmingham of about 4 per cent, in Manchester of about 8 per cent, and in Glasgow of about 12 per cent of the total time of the factories on account of the men being absent from over-Sunday drinking, and that in Glasgow they do not expect to get a full shop until Wednesday morning. If those things are not true, let us have the facts. I believe them to be true, and I believe this is a thing against which the English master struggles with all his heart and without success, namely, a force of men often sodden with drink, which we do not have to deal with in this country at all. I believe if you went with me into an English factory yard among the men you would see it. European concerns are eagerly seeking American equipment and studying American methods. Concerns in Berlin are equipped with American machinery; also in Paris and many more places. They send men over here constantly to study our American cost of production. Nowhere is the rate of output equal to that in America. My French competitor told me they could not do such work as we did. Nowhere else is the problem of saving labor cost so closely studied as it is here. Labor-saving machinery is an American specialty and product, and the concerns in Europe that manufacture with the best labor-saving machinery are concerns that have taken their inspiration from being here on the spot and studying here.

I have known the heads of great European concerns to keep their sons here year after year to study our American methods of production. Nowhere is the cost of transportation so low as it is in America; nowhere are such facilities offered for transit as in America; nowhere is the rate of freight so low; and nowhere do the railway companies adjust themselves so closely to the needs of manufacturers. If you ask to have a switch put into your yard by a European railroad, you may have it put in, but you will pay for it yourself. Nowhere is the discipline in a factory so close, and so sharp, and so keen, as in an American shop, and in proportion to the pay of the men being high, that discipline becomes voluntary. Rarely abroad do sanitary conditions equal those in America, and nowhere do living conditions equal those in America. Nowhere is there a higher and more efficient type of men, who are therefore better producers, but the standard of living is fixed by the man and not by the pay roll. It is not dependent upon his wage, but upon the relation between his income and his outgo. Merely to pay a man $5 a day does not create a standard of living. That depends on the man himself. In India men wear upon their shoulder a sign which says they are peons—"Peon No. 1, Peon No. 2," and so on. Peonage is a crime in this country, and the difference between the two represents the standard, not of pay alone, but of manhood. It is admitted that some elements of burden cost more in other countries. Compare the taxes; compare the question of military service, which interrupts no American laborer, but does seriously interrupt the mechanical operation of shops abroad. It is admitted that the problems of burden and selling cost are nowhere so closely studied as here; and, finally, the whole question of scientific management, now so common, is American, and the only men who teach it are Americans.

From the above sketch it is affirmed, without fear of successful contradiction, that American production to-day is often as cheap or cheaper in the labor cost per unit than foreign, and, so far from needing protection, it needs to be set free, that we may conquer the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But why do not American manufacturers sell as cheaply as foreigners? Sometimes, they privately say, because the law permits high prices and they, of course, sell in the highest available market. Did you ever think of what the hidden reserve in a factory is or may be? You never see it in the books or never know it by the statements. A statement may be made to your Ways and Means Committee that may be perfectly clear and yet not show the facts. I know of a concern that was profiting largely. It was not desirable that, for purposes of taxation, the profits should appear. So they discovered that their real estate was not as valuable as it had been before, and they marked $100,000 off the valuation of it. At the end of another year or two, during which they had done well, they found that their real estate had depreciated further, and they marked another $100,000 off the value of it. There was a hidden reserve of $200,000 which no statement showed. And yet that statement would be filed as an accurate statement of fact. There are many cases of that kind; I do not say of that exact detail.

Did you ever consider the righteousness in a manufacturing concern of officers drawing a large income as officers and also drawing another income as stockholders? Is it fair that they shall come to you and to me and ask that we tax our fellowmen in their behalf when certain men in that concern are drawing a large salary as officers and large dividends as stockholders? And whatever the facts may be, is it not but right and fair that they should be clearly known when they come and ask for taxation in their behalf?

Did you ever consider what compounded duties amount to when you buy something from a retailer? Some one comes to me for an estimate of cost. I, the original maker, take what the actual cost of the material in that thing is to me. That includes the amount by which the price is enhanced by the duty. I then forget the duty. I take the total cost to me and add my percentage of profit, and it goes to the wholesale dealer. You, a secondary manufacturer, perhaps, go to the wholesale dealer and buy from him, and he takes the total cost, which includes the original duty compounded by my percentage of profit, and he adds to that total his percentage of profit and compounds it again. He so sells it to you, and you, in turn, sell it to your customer, another wholesaler, perhaps, and again the duty is compounded.

Your wholesaler sells it to a retailer, and again it is compounded, and by the time your retailer sells it that duty has been compounded, in extreme cases, four or five times. It can not be prevented. So long as the original cost of the duty is there it must be compounded over and over and over again. You can not escape it.

I believe, gentlemen, that protection is an injury to American manufacturers by limiting their scope and by narrowing their horizons. I believe it costs them enormously in the loss of foreign business, and that is one reason why manufacturers in this country are so rapidly ceasing to be protectionists. I could take you to hundreds of manufacturers who have abandoned the protectionist faith. I have never seen on the other side of the House a list produced of the manufacturers in any line who have not applied for a protective duty, nor have you. But one reason why the manufacturers of this country are abandoning the protectionist faith is that their plants have been stimulated to become so large that only in rare years has the demand in this country become enough to take their total product, and they have got to sell it abroad. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And so long as they must pay the high price for materials they find it is sometimes difficult to sell abroad, although such is the efficiency and such the cheapness of their labor in this country, as compared with that of Europe, that that single fact does oftentimes enable them to get their goods sold in foreign markets. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Consider the position of a manufacturer whose raw material is, as it always must be, the product of another industry, who finds his home market restricted or oversupplied, and turns, as he must needs turn, abroad for a market. He is handicapped by compounded duties on his raw material in a market where, by reason of the law, prices are often high. Nothing but the keenest application of brains to equipment and to output, coupled with the exceptional efficiency of his workmen, permits him to secure the needed outlet.

An overstocked domestic market is often no theory, but a real condition. Take away the shackles that bind the manufacturer, and when these conditions occur he will be free to sell in the world's markets, without touching his pay roll.

Protection, however, causes a manufacturer almost inevitably to depend on the Government for help, instead of carefully and minutely studying the details of his own business. The manufacturer should be his own severest critic and should never be satisfied with his results. In every modern shop "six months ago" should be ancient history. Protection, however, has enabled the American manufacturers to prosper by selling to their fellow-countrymen at prices so high that they have not thought it necessary to study their own business closely, because they depend upon Government backing. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Two men went out of a meeting of one of the committees of this House at the time a tariff bill was pending some years ago; they went out yonder, and one put his hand on the other's back, "And now," he said, "if we can not make money we never can." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Such stories as these that I have told you, gentlemen, are the commonplaces of manufacturers' offices. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Now, however, that scientific manufacturing as a profession has begun and is growing, the fact is found that we can and often do produce as cheaply here as abroad, not despite of, but because of, the higher rates of wages here, which are but a partial measurement of the higher efficiency and character of the American workman and of the fine equipment put at his disposal. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ALEXANDER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

PRINTING AND BINDING—COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, before that motion is acted upon, I would like to call up, by unanimous consent, a resolution giving to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department leave to have done such printing and binding as may be necessary. Similar resolutions have been passed in favor of all the other departmental investigating committees.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the Clerk informs the Chair that that resolution has gone to the Printing Office.

Mr. HARDY. I will ask permission, then, Mr. Speaker, to state it.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman how long ago he put this resolution in?

Mr. HARDY. I will say to the gentleman that I brought it in to-day, with the hope that it could be acted upon.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that it go over until the morning.

INCOME-TAX AMENDMENT.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will announce that the document which came from the secretary of state of Arkansas, announcing the ratification by the legislature of Arkansas of the income-tax amendment to the Constitution, has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, for the reason that there are some questions involved in it that would give that committee jurisdiction.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, June 13, 1911, at 12 o'clock meridian.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting a list of useless papers on file in said department pertaining to the Bureau of Insular Affairs and recommending that they be destroyed (H. Doc. No. 68); to the Joint Select Committee on Disposition of Useless Executive Papers and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Attorney General of the United States, transmitting in response to House resolution information as to prosecutions against the American Tobacco Co. or its constituent companies, etc. (H. Doc. No. 69); to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. LEVER: A bill (H. R. 11542) to establish agricultural extension departments in connection with the agricultural colleges and experiment stations in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved March 2, 1887; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. SMALL: A bill (H. R. 11543) to amend the act approved August 5, 1909, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CARLIN (by request): A bill (H. R. 11544) to reimburse the National Savings & Trust Co., of Washington, D. C., for payment of certain Government warrants; to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11545) to authorize and direct the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to place the name of Annie M. Matthews on the pension roll of the police and firemen's pension fund; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. ASHBROOK: Resolution (H. Res. 202) authorizing the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department to have printing and binding done; to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. BURLESON: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 116) directing the Secretary of War to deliver possession and control over certain military reservations to the State of Texas to be used as a sanitarium for the treatment of tuberculosis and other contagious diseases; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LAMB: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 117) to amend an act entitled "An act to enable any State to cooperate with any other State or States, or with the United States, for the protection of the watersheds of navigable streams, and to appoint a commission for the acquisition of lands for the purpose of conserving the navigability of navigable rivers," approved March 1, 1911; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee: Concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 9) instructing the Attorney General of the United States to prosecute the American Tobacco Co. and others; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KOPP: Joint resolution from the Legislature of Wisconsin, relating to a national constitutional convention; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, joint resolution from the Legislature of Wisconsin, memorializing Congress to take proper steps toward a constitutional amendment providing for initiative, referendum, and recall; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, joint resolution from the Legislature of Wisconsin, relating to Sherman antitrust law; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, joint resolution from the Legislature of Wisconsin, memorializing Congress to take proper steps for the adoption of an amendment to the Federal Constitution providing that such Constitution may hereafter be amended by the initiative; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, joint resolution from Wisconsin Legislature, memorializing Congress in regard to passports issued by the United States Government; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, joint resolution from the Legislature of Wisconsin, memorializing Congress relating to sending into any State money or campaign literature in violation of the corrupt-practices law of that State; to the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress.

Also, joint resolution from the Legislature of Wisconsin, memorializing Congress to grant to Alaska a Territorial form of government; to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. ESCH: Joint resolution from the Legislature of Wisconsin, memoralizing Congress in regard to passports issued by the United States Government; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, memorial from the Legislature of Wisconsin, relating to the Sherman antitrust law; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, memorial from the Legislature of Wisconsin, relating to the sending into any State of money or campaign literature in violation of the corrupt-practices law of that State; to the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota: A bill (H. R. 11546) granting an increase of pension to John Soucek; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BATHRICK: A bill (H. R. 11547) granting an increase of pension to Cornelius Unger; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee: A bill (H. R. 11548) for the relief of the estate of Isaac B. Mills; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CARLIN: A bill (H. R. 11549) for the relief of Sarah A. Skinner; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. DAUGHERTY: A bill (H. R. 11550) granting an increase of pension to David Linn; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KIPP: A bill (H. R. 11551) granting a pension to Wealthy J. Larrabee; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11552) granting an increase of pension to Henry Stulen; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. O'SHAUNESSY: A bill (H. R. 11553) granting an increase of pension to Samuel P. Thurber; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11554) granting an increase of pension to Albert A. Hawkins; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PADGETT: A bill (H. R. 11555) for the relief of Nathaniel F. Cheairs; to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11556) for the relief of the estates of Bolling Gordon and Richard Gordon; to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11557) granting a pension to R. T. Crews; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11558) granting a pension to Stephen Anderson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11559) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Horner; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11560) granting an increase of pension to Gustave Freudenthal; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11561) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Beiser; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11562) granting an increase of pension to Thomas L. Ritchardson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11563) granting an increase of pension to Jackson Goodman; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11566) to extend the provisions of House bill 13839, Fifty-seventh Congress, granting an increase of pension to John W. B. Huntsman; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota: Papers to accompany a bill granting an increase of pension to John Soucek; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin: Affidavit in support of House bill 11056, granting an increase of pension to Lyman A. Babcock; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee: Papers accompanying a bill for the relief of the estate of Isaac B. Mills; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HARRISON of New York: Petition of 11 business men of sixteenth congressional district of New York, also of the members of the Miami and the Wichita Clubs, for the repeal of the duty on lemons; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. KONOP: Petition of John Maurer and others, of Appleton, Wis., requesting a reduction in the duties on sugar; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. McKINNEY: Petition of the H. W. Cooper Saddlery Hardware Manufacturing Co., Moline, Ill., inclosing and favoring the resolutions passed by the Illinois Manufacturing Association for a change in the date for making returns by corporations and companies under the Federal corporation-tax law; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MORGAN: Petitions from citizens of the second congressional district, State of Oklahoma, protesting against the passage of Senate bill 237; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. O'SHAUNESSY: Resolution by the Officers' Association, Rhode Island National Guard, favoring the passage of bill to further increase the efficiency of the Organized Militia of the United States; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SWEET: Petition of Homer L. Boyle, of Lansing, Mich., for a law to check and prohibit the enlarging and spreading of war sentiment; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TALCOTT of New York: Petition of numerous citizens, for a reduction in the duty on raw and refined sugars; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. THOMAS: Petition of sundry citizens of Muhlenberg County, Ky., requesting Congress to pass the Berger resolution to investigate the arrest and kidnaping of John J. McNamara, in Indiana; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. UTTER: Petition of the Officers' Association, Rhode Island National Guard, favoring the so-called militia pay bill; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of Arthur P. Sanhorn, of Providence, R. I., against the passage of the bill placing a stamp tax on proprietary medicines; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 13, 1911.

The Senate met at 2 o'clock p. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D.

THE JOURNAL—VOTE OF THE VICE PRESIDENT.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I object. I desire to have the Journal read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made. The Secretary will continue the reading.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the Journal.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I note an omission in the RECORD. I do not know whether the same omission occurs in the Journal. It is an omission to put the name of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] at the end of the last two roll calls as not voting.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary informs the Chair that it has been corrected in both the RECORD and the Journal.

Mr. BACON. The omission occurs in the RECORD which has been furnished to us.

Now, Mr. President, as to another matter to which I desire to call attention before the approval of the Journal, and that is to that part of the Journal which recites the fact that the Senate, being evenly divided upon what we know as the Bristow amendment, the casting vote was given by the Vice President.

I desire to say, Mr. President, that, in my judgment, not only was it a matter of original impression, but upon reflection and examination, so far as the limited time has given me an opportunity to make an examination, in my opinion, with all deference to the Chair, which I am sure the Chair will not misunderstand, that the Vice President was not authorized to vote upon that occasion, and I want to give very briefly the reasons in order that the matter may be of record.

I recognize, of course, Mr. President, that the vote of the Vice President was cast under the authority assumed to be conferred by the clause in the Constitution, which is in this language:

> The Vice President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote, unless they be equally divided.

Of course, according to the letter of that phraseology the Vice President would have the right to vote when the Senate under any circumstances and upon any question should be equally divided, but I think the context, and when I say context I mean other parts of the Constitution, and the manifest purpose of it will necessarily confine the exercise of that function by the Vice President to an occasion in the ordinary business of the Senate, either a matter of legislation, in the enactment of law by Congress, or by any order which may be taken by means of a concurrent resolution between the two Houses as to the order of business, or as to the length of the session, or anything else which concerns in common the two Houses, or as to any order of the Senate which concerns the business of the Senate. For instance, undoubtedly upon a motion to adjourn, which concerns the orderly procedure of the Senate, if there was an equal division the Vice President would have the right to give the casting vote under that authority.

But my proposition, Mr. President, is this: I, of course, would yield to the opinion which upon this exact matter might be expressed in any previous act of the Senate if it could be shown that that act was the result of due deliberation and examination as to the correct method of procedure. My proposition is that as to matters which do not relate to the ordinary business of the Senate, matters which do not relate to measure of legislation by Congress or to the reciprocal or common business of the two Houses, or a matter which does not relate to any particular proceeding of the Senate, the Vice President, not being a Member of this body, has not the right to vote. While expressing that thus generally, my precise contention is that this particular resolution is one upon which the Vice President has no authority to vote.

Mr. President, the provision in the Constitution is without qualification or exception, and yet I want to call the attention of the Chair and of the Senate to the fact that a provision in the Constitution equally as explicit and equally as unqualified is universally held not to apply to a case outside of the particular class of functions I have enumerated. I will read that for the purpose of illustration of the fact that the mere want of qualification does not necessarily carry with it the conclusion that there is no qualification if other parts of the Constitution and the universal practice of the Government shall establish to the contrary.

There is this clause also in the Constitution without any qualification or limitation:

> Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States, and before the same shall take effect shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

Mr. President, there could be no more explicit language than that. That language is not less absolutely free from qualification than is the language in the provision which I first read, where it says that the Vice President shall vote when the Senate shall be equally divided. Yet it is a fact recognized by all lawyers, a fact universally recognized by all the departments of the Government, that such a resolution as that which we passed last night has not to be sent to the President, that it has not to have the approval of the President of the United States; that the President of the United States has nothing to do with it; that he can neither approve it nor disapprove it; and that neither his approval nor his disapproval will in any manner affect or qualify the action of the Senate and of the House in the passage of such a resolution.

Now, Mr. President, what does that show? It proves, in the first place, that the contention that the Vice President had the right to vote can not be based solely upon the ground that there is the unqualified language of the Constitution stating that he shall vote in a case where the Senate shall be equally divided, because that language is not more explicit, it is not more unqualified, than is the language which says that every resolution when it passes Congress shall be sent to the President and shall not be of effect without the approval of the President, unless in the manner prescribed by law it shall receive the requisite two-thirds vote of the two Houses after having been returned by the President with his objections.

Here it so happens that the very resolution which, for the reason stated, is one not to be approved or disapproved by the President, upon which the Vice President voted, is the same resolution, and, I think, upon the same reason denies to the Vice President the right to give a casting vote.

Mr. President, the passage of a resolution proposing to the legislatures of the States the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution is not an act of legislation. It has none of the features of an act of legislation. It has none of the requirements of legislation, except so far as it must receive the affirmative vote of the requisite number prescribed in each House. But it has not the effect of law. It is simply the presentation of a proposition to the tribunal which is to determine it, which is, at last, the legislatures of the States.

It was the design and purpose that the two Houses in their high capacity, one as the representative of States in this Chamber and the other as the representative of the people, should themselves determine it; that it should be, if a requisite number of them so determined, presented to the legislatures; and there is, in my opinion, no proper construction by which it was intended that when less than the number prescribed by the Constitution were secured in support of a measure it could be supplemented by the vote of anyone who does not belong to this body.

Mr. President, I very greatly prize the feature in our Government which calls the second highest officer of the Government to preside over our deliberations. I would not have it otherwise. I am extremely glad of the fact that it is as it is. But, Mr. President, we must look at the limitations. The Vice President is the presiding officer, and it is only in a case where, as I contend, in the ordinary procedure a tie for the time arising by reason of the fact that the Senate is equally divided that there has been the means provided for the unlocking of that temporary deadlock. But it does not come up at all—it does not in any manner reach into the same atmosphere as that which surrounds the Members of the Senate when they are called upon to perform this high function of proposing an amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. President, the Senate is intended to be here as the representative of the States, and there was the double precaution taken that before this instrument, held to be so sacred, should be changed, there must be two-thirds of the Senators to agree upon it—they were the parties selected—and it was never contemplated, in my judgment, that the absence of two-thirds could be supplemented by the vote of the Presiding Officer, who is not a Member of the body. I think the argument could be made very much more manifest, Mr. President, in a case where the final action was the action of a divided body than where it is the action upon one of the preliminary steps in reaching that final act.

But before coming to that I want to illustrate further the fact that there are occasions necessarily where the body may be evenly divided where the vote of a Vice President would be manifestly improper. I will call attention to another provision of the Constitution for illustration of that suggestion. The Constitution, in the twelfth amendment, prescribes the manner in which a Vice President shall be elected in case the electors chosen by the people shall fail to make an election by a majority vote. It is provided in the Constitution that when that arises the Senate shall, of the highest two, choose the Vice President and elect him. If such a case were presented and the Senate were called upon to choose a Vice President and the Senate should be equally divided, is there any lawyer, is there any person, who would possibly suggest that the Vice President would have a right to vote in the choice of a Vice President under those circumstances?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. LODGE. In the suggestion the Senator has just made, of course the Vice President could not cast a vote, because there would be no Vice President.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. LODGE. How so?

Mr. BACON. I think he is, though I may be mistaken myself.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator state how the Vice President in such a case could cast a vote?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will permit me, I will state.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to hear explained how that could arise if there was not a Vice President in the chair.

Mr. BACON. The provision refers to the Vice President, who is to be inducted into office on the 4th of March, and, of course, the election would be held in the Senate prior to the 3d of March, when that Vice President is still in office. That is what I refer to.

Mr. LODGE. Is that the provision of law, that such election shall be held prior to the Vice President going out?

Mr. BACON. Most undoubtedly it would be.

Mr. LODGE. Because at 12 o'clock on that day the old Vice President is out of office. I should like the Senator from Georgia to look at the case which arose in 1825 and see when they voted.

Mr. BACON. That does not change the fact, for they could vote before.

Mr. LODGE. How could they vote before?

Mr. BACON. It does not say——

Mr. LODGE. How could they vote before the new Senate came into existence. The old Senate, the outgoing Senate, could not elect a Vice President for the new Senate, for the new government.

Mr. BACON. Possibly not. The Senator from Massachusetts possibly is correct in that; but, Mr. President, I will put it then as a supposititious case. Suppose it were possible that the election were to be held at a time when the Vice President was still in office. The Senator from Massachusetts may be correct in his criticism; I recognize that. For the moment that had escaped me. But for the purpose of illustration it can be used in the same way. Suppose it were provided that the old Senate should elect before the 4th of March in order to prevent an interregnum—we can very readily understand the reason for such a provision—would anyone contend that the Vice President could vote upon such a question as that?

But I will come to another case that would be more directly within the probabilities. The Senate elects its own committees. It is true we do not usually have elections formally because of the fact that generally the majority of one party is recognized by the minority, and it is done by a simple motion and upon a vote not in the nature of an election; but suppose, as I have seen it in the Senate, the two parties were equally divided and did not agree as to the distribution of the committees, and there should be a contest as to the election of committees; the one side presents one set of Senators to form committees and the other side presents another set of Senators for committees, and there is an election held. Will anybody hold that the Vice President would have the right to vote in the formation of those committees?

When we elect the officers of this Chamber, the Secretary or the Sergeant at Arms, does anybody hold that if the Senate were equally divided on the choice of those two the Vice President would have the right to vote? I do not think, Mr. President, anybody would contend that such was the case. While the criticism of the Senator from Massachusetts may be correct, and I stand corrected on it for the moment, that thought had not presented itself to me. For the purpose of illustration it is just as strong as if it were true that the old Senate elected prior to the 4th of March.

Mr. President, the strong proposition, to my mind, is this: I presume it will be conceded by everyone, coming back from the general illustration to the particular joint resolution in point, that when this joint resolution shall have been agreed upon by the two Houses the President of the United States, under the general provision of the Constitution which I have read, which says that every resolution must be sent to the President and approved or disapproved by him, will not have the function of approving or disapproving of this joint resolution because of the fact that it is one in which the function has been peculiarly confided to Senators and requires that there shall be a certain majority of Senators agreeing thereto. It is not a matter of ordinary legislation. The same reason which has caused it to be universally recognized that the President of the United States can neither approve or disapprove of a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution, I respectfully submit, will apply to the question of whether or not the Vice President has a right in the case of a tie to give a casting vote; and, in my opinion, it precludes him from the exercise of that right.

I presume that it will be said that the vote cast by the Vice President was not upon the final passage of the joint resolution, but upon an intermediate proposition. I do not think that in any manner changes the conclusion which can properly be reached in the question. I think that the consideration of a joint resolution to amend the Constitution is still a peculiar function in which every step is one vital to the last step, and in which all the steps are those confided to the judgment and decision of Senators, which can not be added to or subtracted from by the aid of one who is not included among the number of Senators.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to call his attention to an authority?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, on page 451 of Precedents—Decisions on Points of Order in the United States Senate, a volume which all Senators have, there appears a decision right in point in regard to the right of the Vice President to vote in the case of the election of an officer of this body where there is a tie vote, and if it would not interrupt the Senator too much I would call attention to it.

Mr. BACON. I would be very glad to hear it.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is as follows:

[31st Cong., 1st sess., Journal, p. 68. Jan. 9, 1850.]

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. Foote, "that two chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress during the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly," and the resolution was agreed to.

The Senate proceeded to the election of a chaplain; and

It appearing that 60 votes had been given, 30 of which were for the Rev. C. M. Butler and 30 for the Rev. Henry Slicer,

The Senate being equally divided, the Vice President (Mr. Fillmore) voted for the Rev. C. M. Butler, who was accordingly elected. (See Cong. Globe, pp. 127–128.)

During the debate on the right of the Vice President to vote for an officer of the Senate Mr. Calhoun, who had been Vice President, said: "As the very experienced Senator behind me [Mr. King] is mistaken on the subject of Executive nominations (he claiming the Vice President could only vote in legislative matters), I deem it my duty to say that I, in several instances when I occupied the chair, cast my vote on such nominations. I did so January 25, 1832, in the very celebrated case of Mr. Van Buren for minister to England, and in two or three others." (See Cong. Globe, pp. 127–128.)

That would seem to throw some light on the power of the Vice President to vote.

Mr. BACON. That is a precedent; but, Mr. President, I confess that, while I would not be greatly surprised to hear of a precedent of the Vice President voting upon the election of an officer of the Chamber—which is a matter of comparative insignificance and probably not given very much attention and thought to—I am very greatly surprised to know that it has ever been held that the Vice President had a right to vote upon the question of the nomination of an officer for appointment to office.

Mr. HEYBURN. In executive session.

Mr. BACON. In executive session. I say I am surprised to hear that; but the Senator will mark that what I have said in regard to those matters has been by way of illustration. They do not come up to the vital question as to the right of the Vice President to vote in case of a tie in a matter which is set apart from the usual functions of the Senate, an office to be performed of an entirely different character from the ordinary duties of the Senate, something which is intended to be determined by the votes of those who are the representatives of the States in the one instance and of the people in the other, in which the peculiar function is so marked that it has been always recognized that the President of the United States has no right to either approve or disapprove of a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. If the President of the United States has no right to approve or disapprove of such a resolution, although the constitutional requirement is that every resolution must be sent to him, it seems to me the argument is irresistible that it is a function separate and apart from all ordinary functions; it is one in which the requisite number of the Senate must be had to give force and effect to the action; and it is one so entirely separate and apart that it can not be judged of by any other function which the Senate may be called upon to perform.

Mr. President, I do not know that there is any practical way to reach this matter, and it is not my purpose to make any proposition with that view. I simply desired that the matter should be put upon the record in order that the action of the Vice President may not be considered as a precedent which has passed unchallenged.

When the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] rose last night I rose at the same time—I happened to be standing back of the desks at the time—for the purpose of making the same suggestions which he made, and I would at that time have supported what he said but for the very prompt interposition of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] with the statement that upon an examination of the precedents it would be found all the other way. I supposed, of course, that the Senator had some direct precedents, and I deemed it proper to look at them before making any statement to the Senate. I have inquired of the Senator from New Hampshire this morning, and he tells me he knows of none.

I desire to say, Mr. President, that in a matter of such far-reaching and vital importance the simple fact of a precedent should not of itself be controlling. I will say, however, that if Senators can show a well-considered precedent that has been the result of the examination of able lawyers who have been in this body, such men as Senator George, of Mississippi, or Senator Edmunds, of Vermont, or the former Senator from Indiana, Mr. Turpie, or, still later, the very brilliant and able Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. Spooner—if it could be shown that they and others whom I could mention, Mr. Hoar and numbers of other able lawyers, Mr. Platt, of Connecticut, and others who have been in this body and who have honored it, or, as has been suggested to me, that lawyer second to none, Mr. Thurman, of Ohio—if such men as these had examined this precise question and had come to a conclusion, I would yield my judgment; but, Mr. President, with the limited time I have had to consider this matter, I am very strongly of the opinion that the Vice President had not the authority to vote; and if he did not vote, of course the decision would have been the other way, because the tie vote would have lost the affirmative.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BACON. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I came into the Chamber in the midst of the Senator's remarks, and I do not know whether or not he has touched upon the point I am about to suggest. If not, I would like to have his opinion upon the question whether, if upon the final passage of the joint resolution on yesterday the vote had stood 65 to 33, the Vice President could have voted in the affirmative, thus furnishing the requisite two-thirds majority and have passed the joint resolution; or whether, if the vote had stood 33 to 66, the Vice President could have voted in the negative, raising the negative vote to 34, and by that means have defeated the joint resolution?

Mr. BACON. I think not; and I do not think the Vice President himself would so claim, because the language of the provision in the Constitution does not refer to a case of that kind. That makes it, I say again, Mr. President, the more surprising to me that Mr. Calhoun should have made the statement in the Senate which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] has read, because the matter of the confirmation of an officer—or was it a treaty? I was thinking of a treaty which would require two-thirds——

Mr. SHIVELY. It was on the confirmation of Van Buren.

Mr. BACON. That makes it a different thing altogether.

Mr. SHIVELY. If the Senator will permit me, the reference recalls a very interesting political incident. Jackson was President and Calhoun Vice President. A decided coolness had arisen between the two. Henry Clay was very far from being disposed to compose their differences. In the vacation of Congress President Jackson had nominated Martin Van Buren as minister to England. Van Buren had gone to his post of duty at the Court of St. James. When the nomination came on for confirmation the forces in the Senate were maneuvered to produce a tie. The tie was produced. Calhoun, as Vice President, broke the tie, and broke it against the confirmation of Van Buren. Within a few minutes after the vote was announced a Senator said to Calhoun, "You spoiled a minister to England, but made a President of the United States."

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, it may have been the result of some political maneuvering. Of course we have no presentation of that kind here at all. It may be that such things arise frequently, and precedents are made in some such way as that narrated by the Senator from Indiana. Many precedents have no value, because they are made by Senators voting on small matters on party lines.

I was about to say, Mr. President, that I do not know of any practical way in which this matter can now be dealt with. The proper time, of course, to have made the point was when the Vice President announced the vote. If the view which I take of it is correct, the vote should have been announced the other way. It should have been announced, according to the view I take of the authority of the Vice President, that there being a tie, the affirmative failed and the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] was lost. That I think was the proper parliamentary situation, and then was the proper time to have raised the point of order that the Vice President did not have authority under the law to vote, and that the tie vote must be announced as a failure of the amendment.

I beg pardon for having taken so much time, but I think it is an important question, and I want to say this: First impressions are very dangerous things in law, and I recognized that fact and gave due weight to it in the thought which I have given to it since then, and outside of the illustrations I have attempted to present as to the fact that there were functions performed by the Senate in which the Vice President could not properly take a part—those of themselves would not have been controlling—the thing which has brought my mind to its final conclusion and about which I should like those who differ with me to show the incorrectness of the conclusion is the particular one I have mentioned, that this is a joint resolution so separate and apart from all other acts by the two Houses of Congress that while it falls within the letter of the law and is a resolution requiring the joint action of the two Houses, it is nevertheless one as to which the universal recognition is that the President of the United States has no function to perform in connection with it and can neither approve it nor disapprove it; and for the same reason, in my judgment, the Vice President in the case——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BACON. One moment, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to say, before the Senator from Georgia takes his seat——

Mr. BACON. I want to simply finish the sentence to the effect that for the same reason that the President of the United States is not recognized as having any function to perform in the approval or disapproval of this particular resolution, in my judgment the Vice President has no office to perform in regard thereto, and can not either upon the final vote or upon any intermediate vote vital to that final vote affect the result by his vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have listened with great care and interest to the observations of the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], but I am constrained to the conclusion that his objections are fanciful rather than practical, and that they will not be sustained when the precedents are considered and when the provision of the Constitution is fairly interpreted.

The Senator from Georgia is mistaken in saying that I somewhat abruptly broke in last evening to say that the precedents were against the contention made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. What I did say was this:

I think, Mr. President, when the Senator from Missouri does examine the matter—

The Senator from Missouri having expressed some doubt on the point—

he will be satisfied that the Chair acted within his constitutional rights.

That is what I said, as reference to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show.

I did not then allude to any precedents. I did not think it was necessary. I had in mind the explicit provision of the Constitution of the United States which says:

The Vice President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote, unless they be equally divided.

That is what I had in mind, and I thought that was sufficient to warrant the Vice President in casting the deciding vote.

The Senator from Georgia seems to argue that the function of the Vice President is to break a deadlock. That is not the function of the Vice President's vote at all. No deadlock can occur when a tie vote happens in the Senate on a proposition such as was before it last evening. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] would have failed had the Vice President not voted, and no deadlock would have resulted.

Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia, arguing that the Vice President can not vote on collateral questions, has been answered very pointedly by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], who has quoted a precedent that is directly in order. It goes back to the Thirty-first Congress, and it is there laid down by as eminent an authority as Mr. Calhoun, who had been Vice President, that he had frequently voted on questions of that kind.

But I have before me a more pointed precedent, and I trust the Senator from Georgia will listen to it. It occurred in the first session of the Forty-fifth Congress. The facts are these:

On the motion to proceed to the consideration of the resolution to admit William Pitt Kellogg to a seat in the Senate, the yeas were 29 and the nays were 29. The vote of the Senate being equally divided, the Vice President (Mr. Wheeler) voted in the affirmative, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. Thurman moved to amend by striking out all after "Resolved," and inserting:

"That M. C. Butler be now sworn as a Senator from the State of South Carolina."

The yeas were 30 and the nays were 30.

The vote of the Senate being again equally divided, the Vice President (Mr. Wheeler) voted in the negative, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. Thurman has been quoted by the Senator from Georgia as an authority he would like to have cited in this instance, a great lawyer, a great presiding officer—

Mr. Thurman rose to a question of order, and submitted that the provision of the Constitution that the Vice President shall have no vote unless where the Senate is equally divided does not apply to the case of seating a Member, but that questions of seating a Member should be left to the Senators themselves, under the provision that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own Members," and after debate Mr. Thurman withdrew the question of order.

So, Mr. President, not only did the Vice President in the early days of the Republic, when Mr. Calhoun presided over this body, give the casting vote on the election of a Chaplain, but at a later time Mr. Wheeler, a distinguished gentleman, who presided over this body, cast his vote in the matter of seating a Senator; and Mr. Thurman, having raised substantially the same question as the Senator from Georgia raises to-day, argued it, and, after giving it due consideration, withdrew the point of order and a Senator was seated by the casting vote of the Vice President.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Not to interpose on the particular matter—that is, as to the amendment—I think if it were possible for the Senate to tie on the adoption of the joint resolution itself, although I think that is a mathematical impossibility; but if it should happen, or if it could happen, then, I think, according to the plain letter of the Constitution, the Vice President could not cast a vote, because if you will read the language you will see it is—

> The Vice President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote unless they be equally divided.

I think by the very force of the term if it were two-thirds against one-third and that could possibly eventuate in a tie, under the very language of the Constitution the Vice President would not be permitted to vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator from Texas is right on the point he makes.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will conclude in just a moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire prefers not to be interrupted.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think in the case cited by the Senator from Texas that is true, but in this case the Senate was equally divided, and the language of the Constitution is absoltuely explicit and without qualification. It is laid down in the Constitution, repeated in Jefferson's Manual, that the Vice President shall on occasions of that kind give the deciding vote. While I have not looked up all the precedents, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] has cited one precedent; I have cited another that I think will be somewhat troublesome to the Senator from Georgia if he undertakes to establish his contention that the Vice President was not warranted in voting as he did on the Bristow amendment.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from New Hampshire permit me for a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. What the Senator has cited in the way of precedents might be in a degree controlling as to the infelicity, if I may so speak, of some of my illustrations. But as the Senator says that the Constitution is explicit in its language that the Vice President shall vote when the Senate is equally divided, what I want to ask of the learned Senator is this: The language of the Constitution is equally explicit that the President of the United States shall sign every resolution before it shall take effect, and yet I think the Senator himself will concede that this particular joint resolution would take effect without the signature of the President. I should like to ask the Senator how it is that the language shall be controlling—the literal language—as to the right of the Vice President with respect to this particular joint resolution, and shall not be controlling as to the President with respect to this particular joint resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that does not need any serious discussion.

Mr. BACON. I will say to the Senator, before he replies—I will not take the time to do it now, because other Senators want to be heard—I have some authority from the Supreme Court of the United States that I will read a little later.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the contention of the Senator as to the other clause of the Constitution is rather academic. It is true that the question that was before the Senate yesterday was out of the usual order; it was a joint resolution that did not require the signature of the President; and yet I do not see how that invalidates the clear and explicit and unqualified declaration of the Constitution that when the Senate is equally divided the Vice President shall cast his vote.

I am content to rest my contention, Mr. President, upon the language of the Constitution; and inasmuch as the Senator from Georgia was desirous that precedents should be forthcoming, I am willing to have it fortified by the precedent cited by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], and the very illuminating precedent I have read to the Senate in the case where the Vice President cast his vote on the question of seating a Senator in this body. If more precedents are demanded they can doubtless be found, but it seems to me that those already given are sufficient.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, when this point was made last night by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] it occurred to me that it was not well taken, and I called his attention to the express provision of the Constitution on the subject, which has been read by the Senator from Georgia. The more I think of it, however, the more doubtful I am of the legality of the vote which was cast by the Vice President upon that occasion; and I will ask the indulgence of the Senate to state quite briefly why I am in doubt about it, rather leaning to the view that the vote ought not to have been cast.

The Constitution provides that—

> The Vice President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote unless they be equally divided.

In the same article of the Constitution, and it is important to bear in mind that this is in the article which constitutes the legislative branch of the United States Government, not the executive or judicial or general clauses, it is also provided that—

> Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect shall be approved by him, or, being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

Those two provisions, I repeat, are in that article of the Constitution which creates the legislative branch of the Government, and obviously they refer to matters of legislation, rather than matters extraneous to legislation.

The Senator from Georgia has pressed what I regard as the vital question in this case, and that is, if the President of the United States is not required or authorized to approve a constitutional amendment passed by two-thirds of the Senate, why is the Vice President allowed to cast a vote with reference to that matter when the language in the two cases is equally general and explicit?

Now, we are not without authority, Mr. President, so far as the action of the President of the United States is concerned on the subject of amendments to the Constitution. I invite the attention of the Senate to the case of Hollingsworth et al. v. Virginia, in the Third Dallas, page 378, a case arising on the question whether or not the eleventh amendment of the Constitution had been properly passed by the Congress and properly adopted by the States of the Union. That amendment, as every Senator knows, has reference to the judiciary article, prohibiting the suing of any State of the Union. In that case the President, as I gather it from the facts—the President did not approve the proposal to amend the Constitution in that respect, and it was objected in the Supreme Court of the United States that the amendment had not been proposed in the manner provided by the Constitution. Now, let us see. The Attorney General of the United States, Mr. Lee—and I read from his argument as reported in the volume of the reports—said:

> Two objections are made: First, that the amendment has not been proposed in due form. But has not the same course been pursued relative to all the other amendments that have been adopted? And the case of amendments is evidently a substantive act.

I invite the attention of Senators particularly to this language of the Attorney General, and later I will invite the attention of the Senate to the language of the Supreme Court on the subject:

> And the case of amendments is evidently a substantive act, unconnected with the ordinary business of legislation and not within the policy or terms of investing the President with a qualified negative on the acts and resolutions of Congress.

Mr. Justice Chase, of the Supreme Court, interrupted the Attorney General at this point in the argument and said:

> There can surely be no necessity to answer that argument. The negative of the President applies only to the ordinary cases of legislation; he has nothing to do with the proposition or adoption of amendments to the Constitution.

Mr. President, when the court came to render its decision we find this, and only this, in the report:

> The court on the day succeeding the argument——

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit an interruption there——

Mr. CULBERSON. Wait until I finish reading this opinion of the court, if the Senator please.

Mr. HEYBURN. It applied to what the Senator just read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas declines to be interrupted.

Mr. CULBERSON (reading):

> The court on the day succeeding the argument delivered an unanimous opinion that the amendment, being constitutionally adopted, there could not be exercised any jurisdiction in any case, past or future, in which a State was sued by the citizens of another State or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State.

So, Mr. President, these two provisions of the Constitution being in the same article on the general subject of legislation, the creation of the legislative branch of the Government of the United States, and that of the Vice President being no more general and no more specific than that which invests the President with the veto power, and the Supreme Court of the United States having decided that the President had no constitutional authority in connection with proposals to amend the Constitution, I believe that the proposition made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] yesterday and by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON[this morning is plausible, and in my judgment is entitled to our serious consideration.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I had in my mind when I asked the question of the Senator from Georgia that there had been an election of Vice President, and I referred at once, I thought, to the famous election of 1824, which led to the contest in the House resulting in the election of John Quincy Adams. I did not remember what I ought to have remembered, that Mr. Calhoun was elected by the electoral vote. But I was not mistaken in my recollection that there had been a choice of Vice President by the Senate, and I ought to have seen at once that the Senator from Georgia was necessarily right when he said that he would be elected by the old Senate, because, of course, it can only appear that the electors have failed to choose a President or Vice President when the electoral vote is announced in the convention of the Houses. Then it appears, and then they act under the amendment of the Constitution providing for that. Therefore, of course, the old House, the retiring House, chose John Quincy Adams President of the United States.

The case I had in mind in the Senate and which I thought was in 1825——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him? My attention was diverted. Did the Senator state in what manner the Vice President was elected?

Mr. LODGE. He was elected of course by the old Senate. The Senator was quite right and I was wrong when I suggested that he was not elected by the old Senate.

Mr. BACON. Then I was a little too polite when I yielded to the Senator before. I was right then.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator was right. The case that I had before me, but I misplaced it, arose in 1837 when there was no Vice President elected by the college. Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky, received 147 votes, but that was not a majority. Therefore they voted on the two highest names, Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky, and Francis Granger, of New York, and this is the result of the vote in the Senate, which was the outgoing Senate, on the 4th of March, 1837: The whole number of votes was 49, and of these, 33 votes were given in favor of Richard M. Johnson, of Kentucky, 16 votes in favor of Francis Granger, of New York, and Mr. Johnson was declared Vice President, to take office on the 4th of March.

Now, Mr. President, as to the possibility which the Senator raised of the Vice President being called upon to give the casting vote for his successor, the terms of the amendment to the Constitution, Article XII, which changed the old arrangement, put it out of the power of the Vice President to cast a vote on that occasion, because it provides—

> And if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list, the Senate shall choose the Vice President; a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of Senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice.

The amendment to the Constitution fixes a different quorum for that from every other question, a quorum of two-thirds, and a majority of that quorum elects. The Vice President is not a member of the quorum; he does not count to make a quorum of the Senate. Therefore, by the explicit terms of that amendment to the Constitution, he would be excluded from voting in that case, as he is excluded from voting on a constitutional amendment by the nature of the case; you can not equally divide the Senate where two-thirds are required.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I may not have understood the Senator from Massachusetts, but I understood him to say that two-thirds were required to constitute a quorum, and that a majority of that quorum——

Mr. LODGE. Precisely.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator is mistaken. It is a majority of the whole number.

Mr. LODGE. Of the whole number; I beg the Senator's pardon. I read it hastily. It is a majority of the whole Senate, and that by its terms excludes the Vice President.

Mr. BAILEY. There could be no tie then.

Mr. LODGE. There could be no tie, of course. I want to say, what ought to have occurred to me at once when I interrupted the Senator from Georgia, that necessarily the old Senate must have chosen the Vice President, because there was no other way in which it could be done.

Mr. BACON. I am astonished that I yielded so quickly.

Mr. LODGE. So am I.

Mr. BACON. I was so impressed by the erudition of my friend from Massachusetts that I was a little startled when he told me I was wrong, and I fled a little too quickly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I desire to detain the Senate but a moment. I wish to call attention to the reason why the President has no veto power over a resolution proposing a change in the Constitution. It is because the resolution must have been passed by a vote equivalent to that which would overrule his veto. That is the principle behind that proposition, and it would have been a vain thing to provide that he should have anything to say.

Since I called attention to the precedent I have sent for the Congressional Globe, and it may be well to carry forward some of the wisdom of the Congress of 1850, because it gives us a much clearer light upon what Mr. Calhoun said when he referred to Mr. King's judgment. Mr. King said:

> I suppose it is now to be decided whether this clause of the Constitution applies to elections that are required to take place in this body. Heretofore it has been considered as applying to legislative action alone, and never in any case, so far as I know, to the election of officers of any description in this body. Therefore it is now to be decided whether the clause of the Constitution referred to is to be extended in its operation to elections as well as legislative action, for I know of no rule whatever that has ever been adopted by the Senate on the subject. For myself, I shall be satisfied with the decision of the question in any way that the Senate may think proper. I will only repeat that it is the first time I have ever known the question to be made, and my mind not having been turned to the subject heretofore I have supposed the clause referred to legislative measures alone and not to elections.

Then Senator Berrien, of Georgia, interposes and says:

> I can not conceive how it is possible by any action of the Senate to limit the expressions of the Constitution, which are in themselves so general as to comprehend every vote that may be taken in the Senate.
> "The Vice President shall be the President of the Senate, but shall have no vote except when the Senate are equally divided."
> Now it is proposed, by one construction which is offered, to limit the equal division to cases of legislation; but the Constitution contemplated that the Senate should perform other duties besides those which are merely legislative. There are executive duties, and when the Senate is equally divided in the discharge of their executive duties, the Vice President must give the casting vote.
> Mr. KING. Clearly the Vice President has no power to vote on executive nominations, because if the Senate is equally divided in regard to the propriety of their confirmation they are rejected.
>
> Mr. BERRIEN. But if any resolution should be introduced referring to executive business, and the Senate should be equally divided, undoubtedly the Vice President would have a right to vote. And suppose this question was now in this form, "Resolved, That A B be appointed Chaplain to the Senate," and that upon that question the Senate was equally divided, most unquestionably the Vice President, in the exercise of his power, would give the casting vote. But it seems to me unwise to reason on this subject by attempted analogy, because the language of the Constitution is too plain to admit of a diverse construction. The twenty-first rule is but an affirmance of the provisions of the Constitution. It is:
> "When the Senate are equally divided, the Secretary shall take the decision of the President."
> Mr. CALHOUN.—

This is where he refers to his dissension with Mr. King—

> As the very experienced Senator behind me, Mr. King, is mistaken on the subject of Executive nominations, I deem it my duty to say that I, in several instances when I occupied the Chair, cast my vote on such nominations. I did so in the very celebrated case of Mr. Van Buren, and in two or three others.

Mr. King then said:

> I am aware of that; but the individuals nominated must receive the votes of a majority of the Senate to be confirmed, and there can be no necessity, therefore, for the presiding officer to give his vote. There was no such necessity in the case of Mr. Van Buren as he was rejected if he did not receive a majority of the votes.

The discussion continued and I will ask, inasmuch as it is not more than half a column, that it be inserted in the RECORD in connection with what I have said.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the request will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Constitution contemplates in the organization of this body the election of officers—the Secretary of the Senate, the Sergeant at Arms, and other officers—and the Senate can not be said to be organized until these officers are elected. Suppose an equal division in reference to their choice, are we to stand still and postpone our organization until some one of the Senators shall give way, or shall it be decided by the Presiding Officer? This view of the case seems to me to settle this question, if it be analogous.
> Mr. FOOTE. If the Senator will allow me, I will show that it is not analogous. The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Underwood] will at once perceive that the officers to which he referred are necessary to the organization of the Senate, but we have been without a Chaplain for several days, and without offering any obstruction to our organization.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. True; but I was putting the question as though we were not organized and as though the division had then taken place.

Mr. FOOTE. The Senator is putting the case of the election of officers whose election is necessary to the organization of the Senate. Is that analogous to the case of the election of an officer whose election is not necessary for such organization? Clearly not; and therefore the two cases are not analogous at all. I do not think, however, that the analogy is necessary for the decision of the question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think not myself. I brought the case to show that in such an instance we must remain unorganized, unless the Vice President had the power to decide. By our Constitution the Senate must always consist of an even number, two from each State, and it is but a reasonable proposition that the Vice President should decide in all cases of a tie. The framers of the Constitution must have contemplated, from the very organization of the body—two from each State—that equal division must frequently occur. I think, therefore, there can be no doubt of the right of the Presiding Officer to vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair feels no desire to express an opinion either one way or the other; nevertheless, if the duty is imposed upon the Chair to vote, the Chair would feel guilty of a dereliction of duty not to discharge it. And as it seems to be the opinion of the Senate that the Chair has the right to vote on this occasion, unless some proposition is now made to the contrary, the Chair will proceed to vote and declare the result. The Chair waits to see if any such proposition is made.

The Chair votes for Mr. Butler, who, having received a majority of the votes, is therefore elected.

Mr. HEYBURN. The fact was that it was submitted to the Senate in this case and the Senate sustained the Chair.

Mr. BACON. What was the ruling? I did not catch it.

Mr. HEYBURN. The ruling was that the Vice President had a right to cast a vote on the election of officers of the Senate, and it was put to the Senate and they sustained the Vice President.

Mr. BACON. With the permission of the Senator, if the Senator will analyze it, it was doubtless by a party vote. All those questions are generally decided by a party vote.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will make this further suggestion: The question was also raised, although not an issue, as to whether or not the Vice President might vote in executive session.

Mr. BAILEY. What was the vote by which the Senate sustained the Chair?

Mr. HEYBURN. The vote was 30 to 30. The total number was 60.

Mr. BAILEY. But when the point of order was made and the matter submitted to the Senate, what was the vote by which the right of the Vice President to cast the deciding vote was sustained?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will read what the Vice President says.

Mr. BAILEY. Was there a roll call?

Mr. HEYBURN. There was a roll call. There were five roll calls.

Mr. BAILEY. I have not made myself clear. I understand, of course, that there was a roll call on the election of a Chaplain.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; there were five roll calls.

Mr. BAILEY. On that roll call the Senate divided evenly?

Mr. HEYBURN. Evenly.

Mr. BAILEY. Then the Vice President cast the deciding vote and his right to do that was challenged. Now, that was debated and finally sustained. What I desire to ask the Senator is, What was the vote by which the right of the Vice President was sustained?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is not given, but I will read what occurred.

Mr. BAILEY. I understood the Senator to say that it was submitted to the Senate, and the right of the Vice President to cast that vote affirmed by the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Allow me to read it.

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I prefer to read it:

The VICE PRESIDENT—

After some intermediate discussion—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair feels no desire to express an opinion either one way or the other; nevertheless, if the duty is imposed upon the Chair to vote, the Chair would feel guilty of a dereliction of duty not to discharge it. And as it seems to be the opinion of the Senate that the Chair has the right to vote on this occasion, unless some proposition is now made to the contrary, the Chair will proceed to vote and declare the result. The Chair waits to see if any such proposition is made.

That is in the nature of a submission of the unanimous consent—

The Chair votes for Mr. Butler, who, having received a majority of the votes, is therefore elected.

The Chair submitted it as it is customary to submit questions for unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. Then that appears to have been passed without dissent.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; without dissent.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is, the equivalent.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is better.

Mr. HEYBURN. For a rule, it ought to have some stability.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] declined to be interrupted. I did not rise to antagonize his position.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I did not mean to decline, but I was just concluding what I had to say.

Mr. WORKS. I only desire to understand the full force and effect of the precedent which he cited. As I understood the precedent cited by the Senator from New Hampshire, it was at a point where a motion was made by Senator Thurman that called upon the Senate for a decision of the question, and no decision was rendered. After that motion, or whatever the form of proceeding might have been, it was withdrawn, leaving the matter entirely an open one.

I think that is true with respect to the precedent submitted by the Senator from Idaho as well. No Senator on the floor at that time raised any question as to what was the proper course to pursue.

Certainly, Mr. President, this is an important question. It may be a serious one. If the question can not be properly raised and determined by the Senate of the United States it may be raised and determined at some future time before another tribunal that may be quite disastrous to this effort to amend the Constitution.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WORKS. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Thurman made a point of order and then withdrew it.

Mr. WORKS. So I understood.

Mr. LODGE. He did not offer a resolution; he made a point of order. In the other case, the Chair submitted the question to the Senate, and there was no objection, and he voted.

Mr. WORKS. I did not rise for the purpose of intruding any opinion of my own on this question because I have not convinced myself, but I simply wanted to understand the precedeat cited by the Senator from New Hampshire; that is all.

Mr. GALLINGER. The point of order which Mr. Thurman made was that the Vice President shall have no vote unless where the Senate is equally divided, does not apply to the case of seating a Member, but that the question of seating a Member should be left to the Senators themselves. He made the point of order that the Vice President had no right to vote on a question of that kind, but upon reconsideration he withdrew the point of order, and the Vice President voted and decided it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the approval of the Journal.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I wish to say a word more, as this is a matter of very great importance. None of the precedents which have been cited relate directly to this particular question; they do relate to matters which I had cited by way of illustration, but no one of them has the peculiar character of this particular joint resolution. All of them relate to matters which are within the ordinary functions of Congress in legislation and in ordinary methods of procedure. So, even if all those illustrations were proven to be ill founded, it would not change the gravity of the question, which I do not understand that any Senator has attempted to answer, and that is this: If it be true that this particular joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution is one outside of the ordinary functions of the Senate, not belonging to the Senate as one of its legislative functions, one so perfectly recognized that not only by universal recogniton, but by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, the President of the United States has no function to perform in connection with it, by every rule of analogy does not the same thing apply to the action of the Vice President?

Mr. President, I desire to read a more recent case decided by the Supreme Court of Maryland than that which was read by the learned Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON].

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BACON. I will for a question.

Mr. BROWN. Before the Senator from Georgia proceeds to that case, may I call his attention to the notion which I have? He has emphasized the gravity of the question involved, because, first, an amendment to the Constituton is involved; and, second, whether or not the Vice President's deciding vote was legal becomes vital to its legal submission finally to the States. Does it not occur to the Senator that the question upon which the Vice President voted, whether he had a right to vote or not, becomes quite immaterial when it is recalled that on the final vote, where that same joint resolution was voted upon by the Senate, it received a very large majority beyond two-thirds?

Mr. BACON. The Senator is entirely mistaken in his statement of facts—absolutely so.

Mr. BROWN. The question on which the Vice President voted——

Mr. BACON. I would suggest to the Senator that, of course, what he is now stating is in the nature of an argument. I will yield to the Senator and continue after he concludes. It is not a question he is submitting to me, but he is arguing the question, and I am perfectly willing for him to do so.

Mr. BROWN. I have not made myself understood. Is it not true that the Vice President cast the deciding vote on the substitute of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] to the joint resolution offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. BROWN. By that deciding vote the substitute was carried?

Mr. BACON. Yes; and that is what I am complaining of.

Mr. BROWN. But the point I make is that afterwards the Senate voted again on the adoption of the Bristow resolution.

Mr. BACON. Never.

Mr. BROWN. It did not?

Mr. BACON. No; it did not.

Mr. BROWN. Does the Senator from Georgia contend that the final roll call was not on the adoption of the joint resolution offered by the Senator from Kansas as a substitute for the Borah resolution?

Mr. BACON. No; the final roll call was on the adoption of the joint resolution as thus amended.

Mr. BROWN. Exactly; but it was the same joint resolution which had been offered by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BACON. Not at all; it is a different proposition altogether, Mr. President. I will come to the question as to whether or not that was a vital stage in that proceeding. I am on the proposition now that this particular joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution is not within the contemplation of the Constitution when it confers upon the Vice President the power to vote when the Senate is equally divided; that it is a proposition separate and apart from ordinary legislation, or any legislation ordinary or extraordinary, and that the exercise of that function is one thing of which the Senate of the United States is to judge for itself, and the matter is to be determined by the votes of the Senators and by no other person who is not a Senator. That is the proposition.

Mr. President, the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] read the case of Hollingsworth, which is directly in point, and I have in my hand a case in One hundred and first Maryland Reports, in which that case was reviewed. The court goes on to give exactly the same reasons. It is the case of Warfield v. Vandiver; it is the exact question whether or not this is a matter of legislation; and, as suggested by the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], is not a matter of legislation within the contemplation of that provision of the Constitution upon which the authority is based, which relates solely to matters of legislation. I will say that this case which I now read has been very kindly furnished to me by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER].

In every jurisdiction, where the right of the President of the United States and of the governor of a State to sign or to veto a proposed constitutional amendment has been drawn in question, the courts have, without a single exception, denied the existence of such a right. By the second paragraph of section 7, Article I, of the Federal Constitution it is provided that: "Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approves he shall sign it," and the section continues in practically the same terms as those contained in section 17, article 2 of the Maryland constitution. The concluding paragraph of section 7 is in these words: "Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and the House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect shall be approved by him, or, being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill." Article V declares that "The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution," etc. The Third Congress proposed to the States the eleventh amendment on September 5, 1794, and on the 8th of January, 1798, the President in a message to Congress declared that the amendment had been ratified. By the amendment it was provided that the "judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State."

In Hollingsworth v. Virginia (3 Dall., 378), which has been read by the Senator from Texas—

The question arose whether the eleventh amendment destroyed the jurisdiction of the Federal courts in cases to which it applied and which were pending at the time of its adoption. It was contended that the amendment had not been proposed in the form prescribed by the Constitution and was void. It appeared that it had never been submitted to the President for his approval, and it was argued that it was inoperative because the Constitution declares that "Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary * * * shall be presented to the President * * * and before the same shall take effect shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives." The Attorney General, Mr. Lee, was about to reply to this argument when he was interrupted by Mr. Justice Chase with this statement: "There can surely be no necessity to answer that argument. The negative of the President applies only to the ordinary cases of legislation. He has nothing to do with the proposition or adoption of amendments to the Constitution." On the following day the Supreme Court delivered a unanimous judgment that the amendment had been constitutionally adopted.

Now, Mr. President, I say no Senator has attempted to reply to the question, Why is it, if, as has been recognized from the day of the decision of the Hollingsworth case to this day, and even prior to that time, the President of the United States has no function to perform in connection with a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution, that the same rule does not apply to the function of the Vice President, when the authority conferred upon the Vice President is found in the same section of the Constitution which confers the other power on the President of the United States? The power, unqualified as it is, is held not to give power to the President over such a resolution. The same reason denies the exercise of a similar power over the same resolution by the Vice President. Until that is answered, Mr. President, there is a most important question for this Senate to determine, one very far-reaching in its consequences.

In regard to the suggestion, as I understand it, of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN] the question upon the adoption of the Bristow amendment was a vital question. It was a question which determined the vote of many Senators on the final passage of the joint resolution. The substitute offered by the Senator from Kansas was not objected to in its totality, but in regard to and in respect of a particular clause of it. When that clause was in issue, that was the question which was voted upon by Senators at the time when the Vice President gave the casting vote. The other parts of it were not under consideration and did not affect the vote. After it had been determined, the vote having a conclusive determination upon that particular part of it, Senators again divided, and some who had opposed that particular part of it and who had voted against the amendment because it contained that particular feature afterwards voted for the entire joint resolution. That it was vital can not be more strongly illustrated than in my own case. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas without the vote of the Vice President was lost, and with it lost I should have voted for the joint resolution, as the question would have been upon the passage of the joint resolution as it came from the Judiciary Committee, which was the same as the substitute of the Senator from Kansas except as to the particular feature that I mentioned upon which Senators had divided. However, as the result was not declared in accord with the vote of the Senate, but was declared in accordance with the vote as it was affected by the casting vote of the Vice President, I voted against the joint resolution; in other words, the vote on the Bristow amendment absolutely controlled my vote on the joint resolution, to the contrary of what it otherwise would have been.

I think, Mr. President, that this proposing an amendment to the Constitution is a matter which is not limited in any manner to the final two-thirds vote which is required by the Constitution, so far as concerns the right of the Vice President to vote, but that it is a function in all of its parts, from its beginning to its end, separate and apart from the legislative functions of the Senate, and one upon which the Vice President has not the authority to vote.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest to the Senator from Georgia that it might be well enough if he would enter a motion to reconsider the vote, so that he could have time to investigate the matter to his satisfaction. I merely make that as a friendly suggestion.

I also want to suggest this view to the Senator from Georgia——

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Texas will allow me, the motion would have to be made to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was passed.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand that.

Mr. LODGE. And, of course, the Senator from Georgia could not make that motion, because he voted against it. It could be made, however.

Mr. BAILEY. I would be willing to make that motion for the Senator from Georgia, if he should so request. I want, however, to suggest to the Senator from Georgia, for whose opinion, as he well knows and as the Senate knows, I have profound respect, that, in my opinion, the presidential approval, for which the Constitution provides, and the vote of the Vice President, which is now at issue, are very different. If the Senator will carefully examine the Constitution, with reference to the presidential approval, he will find that it requires that every order, resolution, or vote before it becomes a law shall be presented to the President.

Proposed constitutional amendments are not presented to the President for his approval, because they do not become a law by his approval. They must be ratified by the legislatures of the States or by the conventions of the States, as one or the other method may be determined upon by the Congress, and I myself rather wonder that anybody ever thought seriously of urging upon the court that it was necessary to present proposed constitutional amendments to the President for his approval.

I also call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to Article V of the Constitution, which provides—

The Congress—

I know that the President is in legislative matters considered a part of the Congress, but I think the language which follows differentiates this case—

The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments.

And so forth.

Now, in the latter case the duty of Congress is imperative whenever two-thirds of the legislatures make application, and of course the Congress itself would have no option in the matter, according to my view, and the President could neither give effect to nor destroy the vital force of that.

I merely submit that to the Senator from Georgia, as, of course, we are all trying to arrive at what is just and proper about it, and none of us could be more anxious to do that than the Senator from Georgia. I think, upon consideration, he will find that there is a full explanation for the difference there; but I may be wrong about that, for I have not examined it to my satisfaction, and whenever the Senator from Georgia indicates that he wants further time, if he does want further time, to examine that matter, as it is my privilege to do, having voted in the affirmative, I will enter the motion to reconsider.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator anticipated what I was intending to do and was very nearly on the point of doing—suggesting that that motion should be made by some Senator. I had in mind at the time the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who suggested the point.

Mr. BAILEY. So much the better, because the Senator from Missouri raised the question.

Mr. BACON. I want to say to my learned friend that he does not quote with his usual accuracy the words of the Constitution in regard to the presentation of resolutions to the President. The Senator said that they should be presented before they became law. That is not the language of the Constitution.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Texas pardon me, and let me make my presentation before he replies? I just want to read him the section as I find it. The provision is not the one which he is reading, but is found on the bottom of page 189, and is in this language:

Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States;—

There is a semicolon—that command is complete in itself. It shall be presented to him; and then it resumes—and before the same shall take effect shall be approved by him, etc.

But the mandate is absolute, not simply that it shall be presented before it can become a law, but the mandate is absolute that—

Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary * * * shall be presented to the President of the United States.

I do not want to argue this question now, for this reason: I have had some little experience as a lawyer, and I know that when a lawyer argues on one side it is very hard afterwards to get him to look at it the other way, and I am very anxious that my distinguished friend the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], than whom there is no better lawyer in the Senate, shall not be too strongly fixed in his opinion, because I think it is a matter of grave importance that we should all endeavor to investigate with great care.

Mr. President, I have not made any point of order in the matter. I think this is a matter for the determination of the Senate. I only took advantage of the opportunity in the reading of the Journal to bring it to the attention of the Senate. I think that the course suggested by my friend the Senator from Texas is the proper one, that there should be entered a motion to reconsider, not for present consideration, but for the purpose of giving, not to myself alone but to all Senators, an opportunity to examine carefully this most vital and important question. Therefore, I hope that after——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Missouri will pardon me for just a moment.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Just one moment and I will finish.

So far as the Journal is concerned, the Journal does narrate what exactly occurred, and that is the only question we have to deal with so far as the Journal is concerned. Therefore I shall not oppose its approval, but after the approval of the Journal I think the motion should be made.

Now I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. I merely desire to suggest to the Senator from Georgia one thought I have in mind, which seems to me to be very important, to the end that he may give his attention to it in the further examination of this question. That is this: The vote cast by the Vice President was to determine a tie vote on a resolution offered by the Senator from Kansas by way of amendment or substitute for the joint resolution coming from the Judiciary Committee, which was the original proposition pending before the Senate. That vote was not in the Senate proper, but in the Committee of the Whole. After that vote had been cast by the Vice President, even conceding that it was improperly cast, the measure was reported from the Committee of the Whole, and the Senate, by a two-thirds vote, determined to submit the proposition in the form in which it stood when reported from the Committee of the Whole to the Senate. The question I ask is whether the final action of the Senate does not determine the question?

Mr. BACON. That may be true, and I do not purpose, of course, at this time to go into the question as to what is the legal effect of what has been done. But I do think it is a question which should be settled upon very mature consideration, based upon careful study and examination; and it is with that view that I have called it to the attention of the Senate. I know of no way in which it can be reached other than that suggested by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], and that is that there should be entered a motion to reconsider, to lie upon the table until such time as Senators shall have had the opportunity to make an investigation which shall be satisfactory to them.

Of course, the Vice President need not have my assurance that in raising the point it has been without the slightest personal feature, and it would be furthest from my possible thought to in any manner reflect upon the act of the Vice President. Doubtless he did so with the utmost conviction of his right to do so, and that is not in any manner challenged.

But I think that is the proper course, and I will suggest to my friend the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], or the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], one or the other, both of whom voted for the joint resolution as it passed, to enter the motion in order that Senators may have time for an investigation.

I want to say just one single further word, and that is this: In most of the cases which have been read here as precedents it will be found that the questions were political and that Senators voted one way or the other, according to their political alliances. This does not happen to be a political question; it is not one in which there is a party alignment; and I hope that the opportunity is offered for a calm, dispassionate, and impartial discussion of the question.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to a matter that I know the Senator from Texas suggested, although he did not seem disposed at that time to press it. I do not know whether to this extent it was even in contemplation.

The argument which the Senator from Georgia makes is that dealing with a matter upon which it is not necessary for the President to act—takes it out of the rule authorizing the Vice President to vote. The provision for amendment to the Constitution provides two ways. One leaves it in the discretion of the Congress, and if it stopped there, there might be force in the position taken by the Senator from Georgia. But the other provision for amending the Constitution imposes an absolute imperative duty upon Congress. When two-thirds of the States ask it, then Congress shall provide for a constitutional convention.

Where a duty is absolutely imposed as an imperative duty, and there is a provision in the Constitution which may be invoked by which a tie can be prevented, and it is made possible for the Congress to perform that duty which is required of Congress, it seems to me there can be no escape from the conclusion that it was not only put there, but must be invoked, and there being the absolute necessity, possibly, of invoking it to prevent a tie and prevent the failure of Congress to carry out a prescribed duty, it seems to me there is no escape from the conclusion that in matters of this kind the Vice President must act.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I will suggest this to the Senator from Minnesota: Even in the case, as stated by him, of the compliance with an absolute mandate of the Constitution, it would still have to be put in the form of a statute or of a resolution.

Mr. CLAPP. Oh, certainly. But can the Senator from Georgia imagine a mandate without a provision by which that mandate may be executed?

Now, if it is possible for the Senate to tie upon a mandate, then the mandate would be of no force at all. There must be some provision against defeating the mandate, and that provision must vest somewhere the power to cast a vote in the case of a tie upon the execution of the mandate.

Mr. BACON. There is no trouble about that at all, if I understand the point made by the Senator from Minnesota. I did not catch it at first.

There is no impediment to the proceeding of the Senate caused by a vote being a tie. There is a well-recognized parliamentary law that when a proposition is submitted and there is a tie the affirmative fails and the negative prevails. There would not be a cessation of business because of the fact that there was no provision for the presiding officer to vote.

Mr. CLAPP. That is true. But inasmuch as the execution of the mandate requires the affirmative action, the affirmative action would fail, the execution of the mandate would fail, if the Senate came to a tie and there was no way to break that tie.

Mr. BACON. The Senator is proceeding upon the assumption, then, that with an absolute mandate to call a convention under certain circumstances, and with those circumstances arising, there would be half of the Senate which would disobey the mandate, and therefore there must be somebody to put it into execution. That is the Senator's proposition, as I understand it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I hesitate to call attention to a certain other matter in connection with this vote.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], who is absent, had a general pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] was paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. But upon that particular vote Senators DILLINGHAM, FRYE, and TILLMAN did not vote, while the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] did vote. Had the pair of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] been observed, this controversy would not have arisen.

Mr. BACON. The Senator has read a part of the RECORD and has not read it all. I stated the fact last night when I voted that I did have a pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], and that I voted, without observing the pair, by the authority of the Senator from Maine, which I have in writing.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, I apologize to the Senator.

Mr. BACON. Very well.

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply knew that the Senator from Maine——

Mr. BACON. The Senator from New Hampshire will find that statement in the RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will look it up. We know the Senator from Maine very ardently supported the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] last year, and before he left here he said to me he had a general pair with the Senator from Georgia. That is all I know about it.

Mr. BACON. I myself voluntarily wrote to the Senator from Maine to inquire of him how I should pair him on that vote and other votes which were named by me. He replied to me that as to that vote he had no particular interest, and that I might pair him or not, as I pleased, and I now have his letter to that effect.

Later in the evening the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] applied to me to transfer the pair, which I did, I myself making the announcement.

When the Senator from Vermont first applied to me on the subject, I doubted, on account of the way in which the Senator from Maine wrote in his letter, whether I should do so or not, but upon reflection I concluded that I should do so; and I went to the seat of the Senator from Vermont and had him make the arrangement by which the pair was transferred in his case and in mine to Messrs. FRYE and TILLMAN, respectively, so that we each voted.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have apologized to the Senator from Georgia. It struck me as being rather peculiar, however, that the Senator did pair the Senator from Maine on the final vote.

Mr. BACON. It is usual, before criticizing with respect to a question of pairs, to ascertain what announcement was made in regard thereto; and the announcement was made by me in the Senate last night that I had voted by the authority of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. GALLINGER. And yet the Senator paired the Senator from Maine on the final vote.

Mr. BACON. I did so at the request of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], transferring the pair so that he could be allowed to vote and not be prevented from voting on account of the absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the approval of the Journal. Without objection the Journal will stand approved. The Journal is approved.

Mr. BACON. On a question of personal privilege, I want to refer the Senator from New Hampshire to page 1924 of the RECORD, where he will find this announcement made by me. After having announced the pair with reference to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] I said:

> I also desire to state while I am on the floor that I voted on the Bristow amendment, although paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], because I had his authority so to do.

The Senator from New Hampshire will find that in the RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes, I do find it; and yet immediately preceding the Senator from Georgia announced that the Senator from Maine would vote in the affirmative if present. The Senator from Georgia will notice that in his remarks likewise.

Mr. BACON. I so understood.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN CITY OF WASHINGTON.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, advising that in the statement transmitted in a letter dated June 9 showing the amount paid for the various parcels of land comprising the site for the proposed buildings for the Departments of State, etc., through a typographical error the date of payment for parcel No. 43, square 228, was given as April 15, 1910, whereas the correct date is April 15, 1911.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask, inasmuch as it is a part of the document ordered printed yesterday, that the document (S. Doc. No. 46) be reprinted, so as to include this communication, and lie upon the table. Otherwise we would have two documents to deal with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a memorial of the Secular League of Washington, D. C., remonstrating against the enforced observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON. On behalf of 35,000 farmers of Minnesota I present the following petitions remonstrating against the enactment of the so-called Canadian reciprocity bill.

I want to say, Mr. President, that neither the Lumber Trust nor the Paper Trust has had anything to do with securing these petitions. I ask that the body of one of the petitions be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

The petition is as follows:

PETITION AGAINST CANADIAN RECIPROCITY ON FARM PRODUCTS, WITH PROTECTION ON WHAT FARMERS HAVE TO BUY.

HONORABLE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: We, the undersigned, farmers of the Northwest, respectfully protest against the adoption of the so-called Canadian reciprocity bill, which has been negotiated by President Taft and recommended to Congress. We urge that said bill should not become a law for the following reasons:

First. The schedule proposed provides for free trade on all that the northwestern farmers produce while retaining almost full protection as heretofore on all that farmers have to buy. Practically all the concessions that have been made to Canada are made at the direct expense of American farmers.

Second. The schedule gives Canadian competition free trade in the American markets for grain, but still protects flour; free trade for live stock, but still protects the packers in their meat; free trade on all the farmers' crops, but still protects the Canadian manufacturers against American competition in Canada. (See Schedule B.)

Third. We protest that the immediate effect of the adoption of such a reciprocity schedule would be to encourage American farmers to move into Canada, where the virgin soil will produce greater crops of grain with less labor than can be produced on our own farms in the Northwest. The result will be to decrease land values in the United States and to enhance land values in Canada at the expense of United States investments. It will result in many localities in creating abandoned farms in Northwestern States, and will retard the development of Wisconsin, Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Montana, and Idaho, causing a loss in land values in these States amounting to millions of dollars.

Fourth. More than half the tillable land in all of these States yet remains uncultivated, and we declare to the American Congress that so long as the policy of protective tariff continues to be the policy of this country the agricultural interests have just as much right to protection of home industry and home investments against unequal foreign competition as have the manufacturers or any other interests.

The farmers have been the last to feel any direct benefit from protective tariffs. Why should the protective party expect the farmers to be the first to suffer the loss of that protective tariff policy?

We, the undersigned farmers, therefore earnestly appeal to our Senators and Representatives in Congress to defend the agricultural interests of the Northwest against this unfair and misnamed species of reciprocity at least until the same principle of free trade can be applied to what the American farmers have to buy that is now proposed on what American farmers have to sell.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial of the congregation of the Seventh-day Adventist Church of Pine Island, Minn., and a memorial of the congregation of the Seventh-day Adventist Church of Wells, Minn., remonstrating against the enforced observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CULLOM presented petitions of the International Sunshine Society of the Manufacturers' Association of New York; of the Chamber of Commerce of Watertown, N. Y.; of the Chamber of Commerce of Philadelphia, Pa.; of the Real Estate Exchange of Omaha, Nebr.; of the Commercial Club of St. Joseph, Mo.; and of the Maryland Woman's Christian Temperance Union, praying for the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BRIGGS presented memorials of Swedesboro, Riverside, Hopewell, Pequest, Manalapan, Locktown, Fairlawn, Shrewsbury, and Cape May Granges, of the Patrons of Husbandry; of the Blast Furnace Workers and Smelters of Newark; of the Board of Agriculture of Gloucester County; and of sundry citizens, all in the State of New Jersey, remonstrating against the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the National Brotherhood of Operative Potters of Trenton, N. J., remonstrating against the alleged abduction of John J. McNamara from Indianapolis, Ind., which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the First Presbyterian Church of Rahway, N. J., and a petition of Washington Camp, No. 153, Patriotic Order Sons of America, of Point Pleasant, N. J., praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented memorials of the congregations of the Seventh-day Adventists churches of Bridgeton, Atlantic City, Vineland, and Salem, in the State of New Jersey, remonstrating against the enforced observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Newark, N. J., praying for the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of Haddon Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Haddonfield, N. J., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called cold-storage bill, which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

He also presented a petition of the Religious Society of Friends of Bernardsville, N. J., and a petition of the First Congregational Society of Bernardsville, N. J., praying for the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented memorials of the Philip Sheridan Club and Arion Singing Society of Passaic, the State Board and the Dover Division of the Ancient Order of Hibernians, and of sundry citizens of Bergenfield and Jersey City, and of the Aurora Singing Society of New Brunswick, all in the State of New Jersey, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented a memorial of the Business Men's Association of Norwich, Conn., remonstrating against the establishment of a parcels post, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of Local Division No. 1, Ancient Order of Hibernians, of Jewett City, Conn., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WATSON presented a memorial of the Mountain City Drug Co., of Elkins, W. Va., remonstrating against the imposition of a stamp tax on proprietary medicines, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of sundry citizens of Leslie, Mich., praying for a reduction of the duty on raw and refined sugar, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Jackson, Mich., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Johnston Sunday rest bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of Island Grange, No. 137; Manton Grange, No. 949; Sebewa Grange, No. 163; Grand Traverse Grange; Rock Grange; Rural Grange, No. 37; Newberg Center Grange, No. 695; Pittsford Grange, No. 133; Saginaw Grange, No. 220; Mayfield Grange; Clyde Grange; Aetna Grange, No. 810; Fisher Grange; Barron Lake Grange; Farmers' Friend Grange; Campbell Grange, No. 870; Pleasant View Grange; Scio Grange; and Cass County Grange, of the Patrons of Husbandry, and of sundry citizens of Waterford, all in the State of Michigan, remonstrating against the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WARREN presented a resolution adopted by the Laramie County Cattle and Horse Growers' Association, of Wyoming, June 5, 1911, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for a reasonable disposition of the grazing lands of the West, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of J. C. Underwood, of Underwood, Wyo., secretary of the Laramie County Cattle and Horse Growers' Association, of Wyoming, transmitting a copy of resolutions adopted by that association June 5, 1911, praying for the enactment of legislation granting a fair and equitable protection of live stock and the products of live stock, and remonstrating against the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LORIMER presented memorials of Radner Grange, No. 1588, Patrons of Husbandry, of Edwards; of Valley Union, No. 249, Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, of Villa Ridge; and of sundry citizens of Peoria, all in the State of Illinois, remonstrating against the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LODGE presented memorials of sundry citizens of Thayer, Melrose, and Worcester, all in the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Johnston Sunday-rest bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BOURNE presented memorials of sundry citizens of Lane, Oreg., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Johnston Sunday rest bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PERKINS presented memorials of sundry citizens of Ukiah, Watsonville, Calistoga, and St. Helena, in the State of California, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Johnston Sunday rest bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of Local Grange No. 85, Patrons of Husbandry, of Danville, Cal., remonstrating against the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the State Council, Junior Order United American Mechanics of California, praying for the enactment of legislation to further restrict immigration, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. CLAPP presented memorials of the congregations of the Seventh-day Adventist Churches of Anoka, Minneapolis, Pine Island, Mankato, Austin, Stillwater, Moose Lake, Sherburn, Detroit, Litchfield, Staples, St. Paul, New Auburn, Hewitt, Morgan, and Duluth, all in the State of Minnesota, remonstrating against the enforced observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of the Ancient Order of Hibernians of Winona County, Nicollet County, Dakota County, St. Paul, Madison Lake, Scott County, St. Louis County, and Duluth, all in the State of Minnesota, remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration beween the United States and Great Britain, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SHIVELY presented memorials of the congregations of the Seventh-day Adventist Churches of Peru, Logansport, and Pleasant View, all in the State of Indiana, remonstrating against the enforced observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I report back from the Committee on Finance the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes, with an amendment, and without recommendation. (S. Rept. 63.)

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, whether or not we are to have a report from his committee on what is known as the farmers' free-list bill during this session of Congress?

Mr. PENROSE. For the information of the Senator I can tell him that the committee expects to take that matter up within a reasonable time and give it careful consideration. The hearings on the reciprocity measure occupied nearly a month of patient and faithful work, and that bill having been reported to the Senate, of course the Finance Committee will perform its duty in taking up the free-list measure.

Mr. OVERMAN. I noticed in one of the newspapers a statement to the effect that there is to be no report at this session. Therefore I wished to inquire of the Senator whether he could assure us that there would be a report on that measure at this extra session.

Mr. PENROSE. I can not give the Senator any assurance as to when the report will be made on the free-list measure. It is a very sweeping one. The committee is in receipt of a large number of applications from people all over the country desiring hearings. I assume the same privilege will be extended to them that was extended to the people interested for or against the reciprocity measure.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. The information which the Senator from Pennsylvania has furnished in response to the question of the Senator from North Carolina is not very illuminating, and I want to supplement it by saying to the Senator from North Carolina that in my judgment that committee has no idea of reporting the free-list bill. But I also want to say that if it does not report it, I shall ask the Senate to act upon a motion to discharge that committee, after a reasonable time, so that the matter may be brought before us for consideration.

Mr. PENROSE. I would be very sorry to have the impression go forth that the committee does not intend to deal with the bill fairly and treat it with every consideration.

Mr. BAILEY. I have not suggested that the committee would not deal with the bill fairly, according to their judgment.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator means to imply that the bill may be adversely reported, that is another question, but that the committee will never report it is not founded upon anything that has developed up to date.

Mr. BAILEY. Nothing has developed up to date to encourage us to believe that the bill will be reported, even without recommendation.

Mr. PENROSE. I hope the Senator from Texas will not abandon all hope.

Mr. BAILEY. I will not abandon all hope.

Mr. BROWN. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I understood the Senator from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee, to say that the bill was reported without a recommendation.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. BROWN. Without a recommendation either way, but with an amendment which the committee offers to the bill, which it neither favors nor rejects.

Mr. PENROSE. The bill was amended by the committee and then reported without recommendation.

Mr. BROWN. Is there any recommendation in favor of the amendment which you have reported?

Mr. PENROSE. I suppose the members of the committee who voted for the amendment, being in the majority, would recommend the amendment if the bill should pass.

Mr. BROWN. But, as a matter of fact, do they recommend the amendment which they brought in?

Mr. PENROSE. It was somewhat like the experience yesterday. I assume several gentlemen voted for the amendment intending to vote against the bill. That is not an unusual experience.

Mr. BROWN. Both the bill and the amendment which the committee offers are laid before the Senate without recommendation either for or against?

Mr. PENROSE. There is no formal recommendation of the amendment or the bill.

Mr. DIXON. I wish to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania whether it is the intention of the Republican members of the Finance Committee to make any report on the reciprocity bill.

Mr. PENROSE. There is no majority report of the committee. Every member of the committee seems to be searching his own conscience, and within the minority, the chairman is informed, several representing the committee will file minority reports.

Mr. DIXON. Will the majority of the committee make any report?

Mr. PENROSE. There is no majority of the committee.

Mr. DIXON. Is there a majority of the committee against the bill? Is that what we are to understand?

Mr. PENROSE. It is not disclosing any secrets, because the matter has in some way gotten into the newspapers, that there was a tie vote to report the bill favorably and a tie vote on the question of reporting it adversely. The Senator can draw his own conclusion.

Mr. DIXON. What I want to know is, why, after six weeks of hearings, the great Finance Committee of the Senate in reporting the bill back, which probably revolutionizes the protective tariff of this country, that committee did not either file a favorable or an unfavorable report. I believe it is hardly a square deal to the Senate for this committee, after six weeks were spent in conducting these hearings, amounting to several thousand pages, to report a bill that is of such tremendous importance without giving us a synopsis of what the hearings amounted to and, at least, giving us some kind of an opinion as to whether the bill ought or ought not to become a law. If it was an ordinary measure, such as are introduced here by the thousands, possibly the fact that no committee report accompanied the bill would occasion no comment; but on a bill of this kind certainly some members of the Committee on Finance—the Republican end of it, at least—ought to make some kind of a report to the Senate; and I am surprised——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. It is simply a question of fact. The committee was unable to agree, and the testimony, of course, will be very valuable to each Senator in making up his own mind on this question. A copy of the testimony has been sent to each Senator, and I hope Senators will read it carefully.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will permit me, I want to correct a statement. As we have gone into the committee room we might as well put the exact facts into the RECORD. On the motion to report this bill favorably the vote was 8 to 6.

Mr. McCUMBER and Mr. LODGE. Against it.

Mr. BAILEY. Against it. On the motion to report it adversely the vote was 7 to 7. I voted against reporting it favorably because I do not think it ought to pass, and I voted in favor of reporting it adversely for the same reason; but I felt that the Senate was entitled to an opportunity to judge of that matter for itself. As I could not report it with the recommendation it should not pass, and as I would not report it with the recommendation that it should pass, I agreed that it should be brought back here without recommendation.

I think the Senator from Montana would not be willing to say that the Finance Committee of the Senate should deprive the Senate of an opportunity to consider this matter.

Mr. DIXON. No; but——

Mr. BAILEY. I hope to use my own action in this matter to get the free-list bill out of the committee.

Mr. DIXON. I want to say to the Senator from Texas the greatest committee of the Senate in power certainly, at least, should have the moral courage to express their opinion to the body of the Senate as to whether the bill ought or ought not to pass, and to give their reasons therefor.

Mr. BAILEY. Where can the question of moral courage arise? Suppose there are 7 and 7. Each Senator must have the moral courage to sustain his own opinion, and yet we must recognize that we are merely an organ of the Senate, and that after we have taken this voluminous testimony, and not only voluminous but valuable, we bring it back to the Senate.

Mr. DIXON. Without a word of comment.

Mr. BAILEY. We bring the bill back to the Senate, and we say to the Senate, We are unable to recommend to you action, either one way or the other, but we report it back to you for such action as you think proper to take.

Mr. DIXON. Without any comment whatever.

Mr. BAILEY. Some Members will submit comments.

Mr. DIXON. Does that mean that nobody on the committee is for the passage of the bill, or advances any reason for its passage?

Mr. BAILEY. I do not think that many are very zealous about it.

Mr. WILLIAMS rose.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Mississippi will note that I said not many are very zealous.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to know how many members of the Finance Committee are really for the passage of the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Let the Senator interview his side.

Mr. DIXON. I have tried, but I got no results.

Mr. BAILEY. I will report for our side. Most of our side will report for themselves. I will agree with the Senator from Montana this far, that the bill ought to have been brought back with a recommendation. Without intending to criticize any Member of the Senate or any member of the committee, the Senator who would not vote to report it favorably, it seems to me, ought to have voted to report it adversely.

Mr. DIXON. Certainly there ought to have been some report.

Mr. BAILEY. Because it ought to pass or it ought not to pass; but a Senator decides that for himself.

The only suggestion I rose to make is that it is not a fair criticism against the committee that it brings back the bill for the action of the Senate; for if we had not brought it back any Senator could have moved to discharge us from its further consideration, and I would have voted for that motion myself.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, that would have resulted in precisely the same thing.

Mr. BAILEY. Precisely; for then, as now, it would have been without a recommendation.

Mr. LODGE. We could not get a majority to report the bill favorably. The vote to report it adversely was a tie, by which the motion to substitute adversely for favorably was lost. The only thing that remained was either that the bill should linger in the committee or that it should be brought here by a motion to discharge the committee, or by our own voluntary action in reporting it without recommendation. There was no other way to get it before the Senate.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] has been recognized.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will not yield any further just now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota has the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, this bill was submitted to the Finance Committee, of which I am a member, some six weeks ago. It was submitted for the purpose of taking testimony and reporting back the result of the investigation in some concrete form that would evidence the conclusion of the Finance Committee upon this measure. The majority of the Finance Committee have failed to give their conclusion. So far the mind of the majority, so far as the Senate is concerned, seems to be a blank.

Now, Mr. President, there are two of the members of that committee who have very strong convictions upon the question as to whether or not this bill should pass. I desire to state that inasmuch as the chairman of the committee reports it back to the Senate without any recommendation I shall feel called upon, and I give notice, that to-morrow, immediately after the morning business, I shall ask the Senate to be allowed to present some reasons and some conclusions which I derived from the testimony showing why the bill should not pass. That the Senate may have something and some reasons before it, before we go into the discussion of the subject, I dictated my own minority views. They are in a very few words. I will ask that they be read and inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. BAILEY. I hope the Senator will not describe them as minority views, but just as his own views, because there is really no minority.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is the minority so far as reporting the bill without recommendation is concerned. I voted with those in the minority to report it with a recommendation that it should not pass. I will ask that my views may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

VIEWS OF MR. M'CUMBER.

(S. Rept. 63, pt. 2.)

After nearly two months of investigation of the above-mentioned bill, the undersigned believes that it is the duty of the Committee on Finance to report to the Senate its conclusions thereon.

If this bill is just and right, the committee ought to say so. If it is unjust and wrong, the committee should so report.

The evidence submitted to the committee conclusively shows that the enactment of this bill into law would be a great injustice to the agricultural interests of all the Northern States, for the following reasons:

(1) The occupation of farming to-day pays less profit upon the capital and labor actually employed therein than any other important occupation in the United States.

(2) Therefore any legislation the effect of which would be to make this occupation less profitable is both wrong and inexpedient.

(3) On the contrary, so far as it can be accomplished by legislative enactment, the business of farming should be made more remunerative and inviting.

(4) For the past few years this occupation in the Northern States has shown an increasing profitableness as our production and consumption of food products more nearly approached each other.

(5) But we no sooner enter upon these new and better conditions, when we are securing for farm labor and for capital invested in farms and farm property a more fair and just remuneration, than we find ourselves confronted by this measure, which will operate as a check against any further progress and will even deprive us of the advantage we have gained in the last few years by the upbuilding and extension of our home markets.

(6) For many years the population of the rural districts has been drifting into the cities because of the more remunerative occupations in the cities. The late increasing prosperity on the farms had checked this flow of population from the farm to the cities, land values had advanced, farms long since deserted were being rehabilitated, and an era of general prosperity seemed to be awaiting the farming population.

(7) By destroying, as this measure certainly does destroy, every hope of the farmer of the benefits of an increasing home demand and his ability to finally secure just compensation for his labor, we will again check our agricultural development and send hundreds of thousands of the sons and daughters of farmers to crowd the cities.

(8) For a number of years the northwestern farmers have received for their cereal products a price considerably in excess of what such products would bring for export purposes. The great markets of Minneapolis and Duluth have for several years ceased to be exporting markets for the principal kind of wheat raised in the States tributary to those markets.

(9) It is claimed by some of the supporters of this measure that, as we still export grain from some parts of the United States, our prices are governed and fixed by the foreign prices. This is not true to-day and has not been true for a number of years. The cost of transporting grain from Minneapolis to Liverpool, including insurance, commission, handling, etc., is about 15 cents per bushel. Allowing reasonable profit on capital and risk of business, we can export from Minneapolis to Liverpool only when the Liverpool prices are from 16 to 17 cents above Minneapolis prices.

The following are the average prices paid for No. 1 northern wheat in Minneapolis and Liverpool for the years 1908, 1909, and 1910, as reported by the Bureau of Statistics, Agricultural Department:

Years.	Minneapolis.	Liverpool.	Difference.
1908	$1.11	$1.25	$0.14
1910	1.14	1.14	0

If, therefore, we had been dependent upon Liverpool prices for our wheat, we would have received 3 cents per bushel less for it in 1908, 8 cents per bushel less in 1909, and 17 cents per bushel less in 1910. Computing these losses on the wheat crop of Minnesota and the two Dakotas for these three years, we have—

Years.	Total crop.	Loss per bushel.	Total loss.
	Bushels.	Cents.
1908	174,847,000	3	$5,245,410
1909	232,430,000	8	18,594,400
1910	177,905,000	17	30,243,850
Total loss of 3 States for 3 years			54,083,660

(10) What is true of wheat is also true of flax and barley, and in most years is also true of oats. During the year 1910 the price of barley on the American side of the border line averaged about 30 cents a bushel above that on the Canadian side. During the same period the price of flax averaged about 25 cents a bushel higher on the American side than on the Canadian side. It is equally certain that our dairy products and hay will suffer diminution in price by reason of Canadian competition.

(11) The prices of our grains in the Minneapolis and Duluth markets, of the kind required for milling in this country, have risen above an export basis because of the great demand for such grain in this country. This same character of grain is raised at the present time in enormous quantites in the Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta. These prices on the American side during the past few years have averaged about 10 cents per bushel on wheat higher than on the Canadian side. The prices for grain on the Canadian side are the Liverpool prices less cost of transportation, commissions, insurance, etc. It follows that the moment the tariff wall between this country and Canada is demolished the Canadian product will flow into this country until the prices of both are on a level with a general level of the world's prices.

(12) We are thus not only forced to surrender the advantage which we have been receiving, an advantage which accrued to us only when our home demand became about equal to our home supply, but we will be doomed to remain in that condition indefinitely.

(13) The evidence clearly establishes that in the three Provinces mentioned there could be raised sufficient wheat to meet the world's demand. The three Provinces of the Canadian northwest—Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta—are destined in a very few years to become the granary of the world. They have a combined tillable acreage, according to Government reports, capable of raising wheat, barley, flax, oats, and rye, of 213,826,240 acres. The average production of wheat in those Provinces is about 20 bushels per acre. The world's production of wheat is now about 3,000,000,000 bushels. Thus the enormous probabilities of this section at once become apparent.

It is not contended that all of this vast Canadian territory will in the near future be sown to wheat or other cereals. To do that would so oversupply the world's needs that the product would be scarcely worth the expense of hauling to market. What is contended is that the land with its virgin soil is there. Its possibility of production is there—right at our door. It must for many years produce an enormous surplus, which must seek its nearest profitable market. This surplus would flow into our markets whenever their demand might raise the price of our products above an export basis and immediately drive these prices down to such an export basis. And therefore, though not a single bushel should be imported into this country, the fact that it is there, ready for importation whenever our prices would warrant, will keep these prices down to an export basis.

With these great possibilities, and with soil and climatic conditions which make that section peculiarly adapted to the raising of those cereals which come in competition with the products of the border States, it is certain that those cereals will be raised in that section so long as there is a world demand for them at prices that will allow even a meager profit in their production. And it is equally certain that under such conditions the prices on the American side, with free trade in such cereals, must always be on the level with the prices on the Canadian side, modified by only slight advantages on either side in certain localities by differences in transportation rates.

(14) Thus it will be seen that the farming public, which has supported the protective policy of this Government for over 40 years, has purchased all of its comforts and necessities on a high protective basis, and has, until within the past few years, been compelled to sell its products on a free-trade basis in competition with the entire world, will by this act be forced to yield the advantages it has earned in building up a home market at its own expense; will again be forced to compete not only with the markets of the whole world, but against what is destined to be the greatest wheat-raising section in the whole world, at its very doors, while at the same time it must still purchase on a protected market.

(15) Our farming population has for years patiently paid their assessments of tariff duties, which gave them only an indirect and somewhat uncertain benefit, with a hope and promise that with our growing population our home consumption would soon equal our production of food products and that they should then reap the full benefits of protection in an enhanced value of all their products; that their earning for their labor and capital employed would be placed on a plane of equality with like earning of labor and capital employed in the city; that they could then surround themselves with the comforts, conveniences, and opportunities of the city life. But just as this hope and promise were about to be realized and this assured and permanent prosperity is almost within their grasp the hope is dashed to the earth and the promise is broken by allowing their only great competitor free access to those home markets developed and purchased by their sacrifices.

(16) The great majority of the farms along the border States, and especially of those west of the Mississippi, have been sold and resold at prices which could only be justified on the assumption that the benefits we were receiving from a protected home market would continue. Heavy mortgages have been given for deferred payments, and to now destroy this expectation and depress and diminish the price of the products of the farm is an injustice against every purchaser of such land.

(17) This measure is subversive of the whole idea of protection, and if enacted into law will inevitably lead to the overthrow of that policy.

P. J. MCCUMBER.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. HEYBURN addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi, the Chair understands, desires to submit some matter from the committee in connection with the report.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I shall not bore the Senate by having it read, but I wish to submit the views of the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], and my own, favorable to the passage of Canadian reciprocity legislation. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD and as a document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In connection with the other report. Without objection, that order will be entered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

VIEWS OF MESSRS. WILLIAMS, STONE, AND KERN.

Mr. WILLIAMS, for himself, Mr. STONE, and Mr. KERN, submitted the following views:

That some sort of reciprocal trade arrangement between us and our nearest neighbor, Canada, is better than none at all goes without saying; that the particular trade arrangement agreed upon is a good one is made evident by the fact that most of those who are trying to defeat it are trying to do it not directly, but indirectly by amendment.

I do not believe that I can better express the objections to the Root amendment, which has been grafted upon the bill by the committee, than by quoting a part of a speech made by the President of the United States at Orchestra Hall, Chicago, Ill., on June 3, 1911:

"Second, as to print paper. The Tariff Board has made a most exhaustive examination of the comparative cost of production of print paper in the United States and in Canada. Indeed, the report is so complete as to vindicate the judgment of those who proposed the use of a board for the purpose of determining the difference in the cost of articles at home and abroad with a view to assisting the Congress in a rational readjustment of the tariffs. This report shows that the mills best situated in the United States, with the best machinery, can manufacture print paper at a slightly less cost than the mills best situated in Canada; that the Canadian mills, on an average, have newer machinery than the American mills; that there are quite a number of American mills that use old machinery, and therefore do not conduct their business on economical lines; that the average cost of production in all the mills of the United States, including the poorest mills, is about $5 more a ton than the cost of production in Canada, with its newer mills, and that this $5 is just about the difference between the cost of pulp wood in the United States and the cost of pulp wood in Canada. It seems fairly reasonable to suppose, too, that the pulp wood, which only grows north of the forty-fifth degree of latitude, will be exhausted in the United States or remain in control of a few persons, because of the drain of the American mills.

"It is of the highest importance, therefore, not only to the consumers, but to the manufacturers of print paper, in order that they may secure their raw material at a reasonable price, to secure a letting down of the bars in Canada for the exportation of pulp wood. The Provinces of Canada have control over the Crown lands, in which nine-tenths of the pulp wood is grown, and they have imposed restrictions and export duties of various kinds upon the pulp wood in the Crown lands, in order to prevent the export of the wood except in the form of paper. The agreement provides that whenever the Canadian Provinces remove all restrictions upon the exportation of pulp wood, then Canada will permit American paper to come in free into Canada and the United States will permit Canadian paper to come in free into the United States. This exact agreement is not embodied in the bill as recommended to the House by the Ways and Means Committee and as passed by the House. Instead, in order to induce the Canadian Provinces, over whom the Dominion can exercise no control, to lift the restrictions upon the exportation of their pulp wood, it is provided that when the paper is made in Canada from wood grown on land not under export restrictions the paper may come into the United States free; and it is hoped that the difference of $5.75 between the duty on paper from restricted wood and no duty on paper made from unrestricted wood will induce the Provinces to lift their restrictions. It seems to me that this is treating the paper manufacturers of the United States fairly. It is a provision calculated to secure to them a source of supply where they can get their wood at $5 less a ton than in this country, with the disadvantage of a small competition of paper made in Canada from Canadian wood upon which there is no restriction. It is a provision looking far into the future, and which we all hope may create a condition of absolutely free trade in paper and its materials, a condition that some candid and sagacious paper manufacturers will admit is the best thing for the industry, as it certainly is for the consumers.

"In the first class comes what is known as the Root amendment. Mr. ROOT proposes an amendment to the bill as it came from the House embodying the exact terms of the reciprocity agreement with reference to paper and material—that is, a provision that when the restrictions on the exportation of pulp wood from Canada are removed by the Provinces so that pulp wood may come in free into the United States without the payment of an export duty, then there may be free trade between Canada and the United States in print paper. The pending bill provides, as I have already stated, that in order to induce the lifting of the restrictions which are now imposed by the Canadian Provinces on wood from Crown lands, which includes about nine-tenths of the Canadian wood, paper made in Canada from wood upon which there is no restriction in Canada may come in free. It is only fair to say, with reference to the Root amendment, that it is in exact accordance with the agreement. But it does not offer the inducement to the lifting of the Canadian restrictions which the present provision in the bill does. More than this, there are so many in favor of the provision in the bill as it passed the House that I fear that its adoption in the Senate might prove a tactical obstacle to the passage of the bill through both Houses."

Two things are perfectly evident to my mind: First, that with regard to print paper, wood pulp, and pulp wood there was no real agreement arrived at between the negotiators representing Canada and the United States. The obstacle lying in the way was what may be properly called the "state rights" of the Canadian Provinces. All that the Dominion Government of Canada could promise was to do whatsoever was in its power to do in order to induce the removal of restrictions upon exportations, so that the two Governments, without coming to any executable agreement—the two national minds not meeting upon any common ground within the power of the Canadian Government constitutionally to occupy—agreed upon a lot of "ifs" and "ands," as if one had said to the other: "If you will try to bring about this result, I will try to bring about that result."

The Canadian Government, in the bill now pending before the Canadian Parliament, uses the following language under the head of "Articles free of duty":

"Pulp of wood, mechanically ground; pulp of wood, chemical, bleached or unbleached; news-print paper and other paper, and paper board, manufactured from mechanical wood pulp or chemical wood pulp, or of which such pulp is the component material of chief value, colored in the pulp, or not colored, and valued at not more than 4 cents per pound, not including printed or decorated wall paper.

"Provided, That such wood pulp, paper, or board, being the products of the United States, shall only be admitted free of duty into Canada from the United States when such wood pulp, paper, or board, being the products of Canada, are admitted from all parts of Canada free of duty into the United States."

This proves Canada's good faith. She is trying to bring about the result that she promised. It is her part of the undertaking.

Our Government attempts to meet the situation by giving free entry as an inducement to the lifting of the Canadian restrictions by the Provinces. It seems to me to be evident that that is the only way in which the lifting of the restrictions upon exportations of the raw materials from Canada can be secured. Our manufacturers can not get their spruce from Canada on any other plan. It seems equally evident that the Root amendment will defeat the purposes of both Governments, although in language it pretends to strive to execute that purpose.

If print paper and wood pulp made out of wood in Provinces which have removed the restriction be permitted to come in free to us, while the duty remains upon print paper and wood pulp and pulp wood made out of Canadian wood in Provinces which have retained the restriction, then it is evident that it becomes to the immediate interest of the wood and wood pulp and paper people of Canada to bring to bear every inducement upon the Provinces not removing restrictions to get them to remove the restrictions, thus benefiting our consumers and our manufacturers of paper.

I am in favor of a majority of the amendments that were offered in committee and that will be offered upon the floor of the Senate if offered as original propositions, standing upon their own merits, but I am not in favor of them as amendments to this bill, because I think that their effect in all cases and their purpose in most cases is to defeat Canadian reciprocity, either by means of causing an adverse vote upon the proposition as thus amended in the Senate or by forcing a protectionist President to veto the bill as passed.

I regret that it was not found possible in our negotiations with Canada to remove the duty on dressed meat and flour going from each country into the other. I am willing to admit dressed meat and flour into the United States, not only from Canada, but from all the world, though I would much prefer that a slight revenue duty, not enough to interfere with possible importations, were levied.

I am in favor of the House farmers' free-list bill, with some immaterial amendments, but I am not in favor of it as an amendment to this bill, because I think the result of putting it on would be to defeat the bill, and I suspect, not discourteously, I hope, that the purpose in putting it on is to defeat the bill. I am not willing to run the risk of defeating two measures that I favor merely to escape criticism for not having voted to tack one of them as an amendment upon the other. My constituents have plenty of sense to understand the real situation and the shallowness, if not bad faith, of the criticism.

When I want two things, I want both, but if I can't have both, then I want the one I can get. Not only is it true that I would, as original propositions, favor most of the amendments offered, but I could easily write down several hundred others that I would like to put upon the statute books, reducing the burden of tariff taxation upon the people. But I see no particular sense in refusing to shoot a rattlesnake because I can not at the same time shoot an anaconda. This is especially true if the anaconda is not within effective gun range.

JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS.

Substantially and in the main I agree with the above statement of Senator Williams's views.

WM. J. STONE.

I am for the Canadian reciprocity bill because it looks to freer trade and more intimate commercial relationship between this country and Canada. I am opposed to the Root amendment for the reasons so well stated by Senator WILLIAMS. I would be glad to support any of the proposed amendments which, in independent and additional sections, provide for reductions in tariff taxation if the reciprocity bill, with such amendments, could command enough votes to insure its passage. But, believing that the reciprocity bill will pass the Senate without the amendments, and would fail of passage with them, I can see but one course to be pursued by the friends of reciprocity, and that is to oppose all amendments which, if added, would likely defeat the measure.

The House of Representatives has passed a farmers' free-list bill, which is now before the Finance Committee of the Senate. It will take but little time for the consideration and passage of that measure, or one of similar import. I am entirely willing to support any measure, no matter by whom proposed, which looks to a reduction of the tariff burdens, but I am not willing to imperil the success of any one measure looking to the relief of the people by amalgamating it with another, when it is apparent that such amalgamation will defeat both. If Republican Senators who have proposed amendments to the reciprocity bill looking to tariff reduction are earnest and sincere in such action they will gladly join with the Democrats in the support of the reform measure already enacted by the House and now pending before the Finance Committee of this body.

JNO. W. KERN.

Mr. HEYBURN obtained the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask the Senator from Idaho if he will yield to me to offer a minority report upon this bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it to be read?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I do not ask to have it read.

Mr. HEYBURN. I rose for a kindred purpose; but I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wish to file or to present my views adverse to the passage of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They will be printed in the RECORD and printed as a part of the document. All the reports will be printed as one document when they are all received.

The matter referred to is as follows:

VIEWS OF MR. LA FOLLETTE.

I herewith respectfully submit to the Senate the reasons which compel me to oppose House bill 4412 in its present form.

The pending measure is not a treaty. It is a revenue bill. That it is framed to give effect to a tentative agreement between this and the Canadian Governments in nowise changes its character. It is a tariff bill.

It is not framed upon any principle heretofore recognized in the history of the tariff legislation of this Government. It represents neither the principle of protection nor that of a tariff for revenue only. The only principle which may be fairly said to find consistent expression in this bill is the principle of free trade.

It is perfectly consistent for one who believes in free trade to support it.

I respectfully submit that no man who believes either in a tariff for revenue only or in a protective tariff can consistently give it his support.

In the belief that duties should represent the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, with others I contended, when the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill was pending, for reductions in duties to that level in so far as the information then at hand furnished any safe criteria to determine rates upon that principle.

I shall continue to advocate tariff legislation based upon that principle.

I believe in reciprocity. I believe in reciprocity with Canada. The mutual give and take of tariff concessions between our country and our world neighbors, along the lines laid down by Blaine and McKinley, is a policy that has in view the best welfare of all concerned. The fair exchange of commercial privileges between the people of two great producing and consuming and interdependent nations must result in good for both.

But I protest against this proposed revision of our tariff by Executive mandate. I protest against this diplomatic bargain that is masquerading in the guise of reciprocity. It is not reciprocity. It is not a fair exchange of tariff advantages between our citizens and the citizens of Canada. It is a tariff trade, conceived in special-interest selfishness, negotiated in secret, and brought into the open with the attractive label of reciprocity as a bid for the favor of the American public—a people who believe sincerely in reciprocity that is genuine.

The injustice and the unfairness of this one-sided arrangement, when fully understood by all people who believe in justice and fair dealing, will meet with the resentment it merits. Reciprocity—true reciprocity—implies a fair exchange between those whose products are the subjects of the exchange. This compact, the ratification of which is demanded without change, without the exercise of a legislative judgment on the part of Congress, is, in plain English, an Executive bargain, the terms of which require the farmer to surrender his market at an enormous loss to secure valuable concessions to a few prosperous special interests. That is all. President Taft's Canadian pact will increase the profits of the railroads, the milling interests, and the Beef Trust.

The railroads, particularly the Hill line, has 15 or 20 branches extending far up into the wheat-producing sections of Canada. Mr. Hill is one of the strongest supporters of the President's pact. He hungers for the big tonnage to flow from Canadian wheat into a free American market. The effect of this competition on our farmers does not concern him. There will be no reduction in his international freight rates.

The milling interests approve of the President's pact. They want the cheaper wheat which will result from a Canadian glut of the northern American market. The millers are safe. Canadian flour can not come in free to compete with them. The farmer can take his cut in prices. The price of flour will not be affected.

The Beef Trust regards President Taft's Canadian deal as a good thing. It means free cattle and sheep for the packing houses. This strengthens the position of the trust and makes it easier to hold down prices for American cattle and sheep. The trifling reduction of duty on dressed meats will in nowise interfere with the firm control of the price of dressed meats by the packers. It will put from $12 to $18 in the pocket of the packer to remove the duty from the fat steer. It will cost the consumer whatever the packer pleases to charge for dressed meats under the President's pact.

Our great consuming public must still buy what it uses in a highly protected market. And the farmer, as a consumer, gets no compensating benefit in what he has to buy. He is asked to sell what he produces in a free-trade market and buy what he needs in a protected market.

If there is any justice at all in a protective tariff, it must be found in the impartial application of it to all industries. This proposed agreement does violence to that principle. It singles out the farmer and forces free trade upon him, but it confers even greater benefits upon a few of the great combinations sheltered behind the high rates found in the Payne-Aldrich tariff.

The American farmer, through years of patient toil, has given his support to protection to build up the manufacturing interests of the country. The protective tariff directly benefited his own industry to a far less degree than any other great interest in this country. Through all those years there was held out to him the promise that if he would pay the higher prices necessary to maintain a high wage scale for the men in the factories he would be compensated by the better market for his produce—the home market at his own door.

This home market has been at last developed. Now it is proposed that he shall divide this market with Canada. The injury to our agricultural interests that will result from such an arrangement will be appalling—not alone the tens of millions of dollars annually, great as that will be, but also in the incentive to apply to our lands the intensive cultivation and scientific management which alone will enable our business of tilling the soil to be successfully continued at all.

This agreement is not in the interest of the consumer. Relief from the high cost of living is not to be found in such a tariff compact as that represented in the pending bill. What avails it, for example, to bring the supply of Canadian wheat and cattle and sheep into our country free when we still must pay the same price for flour to our millers and the same price for dressed meats to our packers?

It is not necessary to wrong any class or do injustice to any interest in order to benefit the consumer. And it is scarcely less than criminal to make a scapegoat of the farmer for the benefit of any unlawful combination.

President Taft and the Congress had ample opportunity to benefit every consumer and substantially reduce the cost of living in every home by revising duties downward as promised when the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill was enacted—and that, too, without impairing the just measure of protection on any article of production in any industry.

The combined forces that stand between the American farmer and the full enjoyment of his own market—that home market he suffered so much to create—will continue to interpose between the consumer and the necessaries of life. Wheat is free; but there will be a tariff of 50 cents a barrel upon flour. Live stock is free; but there is provided a tariff of 1¼ cents a pound on fresh meats, bacon, hams, and dried or otherwise prepared meats, of 20 per cent on canned meats, canned poultry, and extract of meat. Flaxseed is free; but on its product, linseed oil, there is a tariff of 15 cents a gallon. Something far different from this arrangement, with regard to foodstuffs, is needed to reduce the cost of living.

No relief from the excessive cost of living will result from the changes in the tariff on the manufactures covered by this agreement. While Canada is our formidable competitor, actually and potentially, in agriculture, we have now such an overwhelming advantage that we need never fear that Canadian manufacturing will threaten our supremacy on this continent. If the statement of President Taft that the cost of production is substantially alike in the two countries is true as to manufactures, what possible hope is there for Canadian capital to build mills and compete with our great and established industries over a tariff wall? The facts do not warrant the contention that our consumers will be able to purchase manufactured articles any cheaper if this agreement passes.

It is not the farmer, it is not the consumer, for whom these negotiations were made. It was made to benefit the railroad, the miller, the packer, the newspaper publisher.

The newspaper publishers are promised a free market for print paper, for which they expend about $55,000,000 annually. No one who investigates the conditions under which the newspapers of this country have been compelled to purchase their supply of print paper can escape the conclusion that the publishers have been subjected to extortion. Prices have been arbitrarily fixed for them, and to keep their enterprises going they have been forced to submit to exactions unwarranted by conditions in the wood-pulp and paper-making industries—conditions rendered possible only because of the unlawful trust organizations of the paper manufacturers.

It is a matter of common knowledge that the newspaper publishers have had to accept whatever contracts the Print Paper Trust offered them to sign or be denied a paper supply with which to continue business. It is true the hearings of the committees of Congress contain many denials by paper manufacturers of the existence of this trust, but against these are the indictments, pleas of guilty, convictions, and fines, all of record, in more than 50 instances.

The conditions under which the publishers of newspapers are forced to conduct their business are intolerable. These conditions call for action which will afford immediate relief. It should be dealt with directly and not by indirection. The removal of this duty, in justice to the users of paper, should be the direct and deliberate action of Congress. It is our right and duty to fix the tariff on certain varieties of pulp and paper so as to best serve the interests of our country. All of the evidence sustains the contention for the immediate removal of the duty.

I am satisfied from the recent investigations made by the Tariff Board that, with the exception of wood pulp, we can manufacture paper on an even basis with Canadian manufacturers. Therefore, I believe we should, in accordance with the principle that the tariff should be based on the difference between the cost of production here and abroad, remove the present duty from print paper. The proposed method of doing this, however, can not in justice be approved. However just the demands of the publishers to be relieved from the oppressive prices fixed by the paper makers' combination, it does not outweigh the gross injustice of this pact. It is the duty of Congress to put print paper on the free list. It is not the duty, nor should it be made the privilege, of the Executive to secure this concession from Canada at the expense of our agricultural interests.

Furthermore, this scheme of tariff revision is an invasion of the legislative branch of our Government by the Executive. Strip it of the enticing name that has been given to it and it is plain tariff revision. And as tariff revision it is even more iniquitous than the Payne-Aldrich revision. It is not scientific. It is not the product of the Tariff Board. It can not be defended even as an attempt to lower our excessive duties on a schedule-by-schedule plan. Why cut off the low duties on farm products that oppress nobody and leave untouched the flagrantly high and burdensome duties on trust-made necessities?

The history of this pact discloses the same sort of influences, the same secret conferences, the same consideration for powerful interests that characterized the framing of the Aldrich schedules. Beginning with personal conferences between the big beneficiaries and the administration, and coming before us now with all the pressure of administrative influence behind it, we are confronted with a situation not unlike that of two years ago in the Senate. Like that other revision, too, this is marked by the same trading and bartering that always has worked so much injustice upon the public. The influential interests, as always, were on hand. But not the farmer. The farmer had no voice in this agreement. He had no part in the changing of the schedules, though he is more seriously affected than all others. This is not the kind of tariff revision demanded by the American people. Downward revision mandates will not be satisfied by such administrative bargaining.

There are already indications that this pact, if ratified by Congress, will involve the United States in serious tariff and trade complications with other countries. It will place us in the dilemma of making similar diplomatic bargains with the great nations of the whole world. I refer to the "most-favored-nation" clause of commercial treaties and to the maximum and minimum provision of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law. Our Government has steadfastly and consistently pursued the policy in negotiating tariff treaties that when the "most-favored-nation" treatment is accorded to one country it is also, and as a matter of right, accorded to any other country that extends to us similar concessions. This traditional policy was complicated by the maximum and minimum provision of the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Act.

Now, if this new tariff arrangement with Canada is consummated, we shall be placed in the position of establishing a new set of minimum tariff rates, which, under our well-settled diplomatic policy and the maximum and minimum clause, would force the Department of State to enter into negotiations with any country that wished to receive the same treatment as Canada under the "most-favored-nation" clause. To refuse these demands would be to abandon our traditional policy, would precipitate international tariff complications, and may imperil our whole tariff structure. That there is real danger in this direction is indicated by the fact that the question has been raised in the British Parliament and the fact that there have been inquiries, understood to have come from Germany, as to the answer of the United States on the question of extending the rates provided in the Canadian agreement to the products of that country.

The gross injustice of the proposed bill impels me to oppose it. I recognize no canon of right and fair dealing that would permit me to support it in its present form. If, however, it is to be enacted into law, it should not pass without amendments in the interest of the great body of consumers, including the farmers, who are compelled to carry all the burden of the President's lopsided pact. If agriculture is to be legislated out of $60,000,000 to $70,000,000 to help Mr. Hill's railroad to larger dividends, the millers and the packers to larger profits, and the newspapers to free themselves from trust extortion, then we should avail ourselves of this opportunity to reduce in some reasonable measure the excessive tariff burden and the high prices which the farmers and other consumers are required to pay for all they buy.

This is a tariff measure. It is my conviction that until such time as scientific investigation shall enable us to adjust all schedules on the difference-in-cost principle there should be no effort spared whenever the subject of tariff revision is before Congress to reduce the notoriously excessive duties as a means of affording immediate, even though partial, relief to the consumer. So, in the present instance, we have the opportunity to reduce to a considerable extent the cost of living by revising downward a few of the most excessive schedules, such as manufactured wool, cotton, sugar, iron, and steel.

I purpose to offer amendments providing for a complete revision of the wool and cotton schedules of the present Payne-Aldrich tariff law, revision of the rates on structural iron and steel, and certain other paragraphs of that schedule; also amendments revising the sugar schedule. Such revision downward, while reducing our Government revenues less than $10,000,000 annually, will effect a reduction in the cost of living by lowering prices to the consuming public aggregating more than $200,000,000 a year.

I shall ask that all duties on manufactures of wool in Schedule K be placed squarely on an ad valorem basis, with an average reduction of 25 per cent. The character of Schedule K as to all manufactures of wool is well known to the public. Its fraudulent compensatory duties, its unfair discrimination against the carded-wool manufacturers in favor of the worsted-goods manufacturers, and its iniquitous discrimination against the poor man's cloth in favor of that of the rich man have all been exposed in detail. The ad valorem rates proposed in my amendments will wipe out completely the inequality that is found in the existing rates—rates that rise higher and higher as the value of the cloth declines, exceeding 200 per cent on the cheapest while dropping as low as 80 per cent on the most expensive cloths.

These amendments will not affect the woolgrower. They provide reasonably ample protection for all manufacturers of wool. The consumer is no longer left completely at the mercy of the manufacturer.

Like the wool tariff, the cotton tariff—Schedule I—lays its unreasonable burdens upon the backs of the great mass of people who can not afford the expensive cotton goods. It does this through the complex classifications providing enormous duties on certain articles and relatively insignificant duties on other articles. My amendments to this schedule contemplate an average reduction of 7 per cent ad valorem.

If adopted, they will, at a stroke, eliminate from this schedule the excesses and discriminations which cost the consuming public, and particularly that portion of it least able to pay the price, not less than $50,000,000 annually. In this amendment, however, as in the amendment to Schedule K, I have left a margin in favor of the manufacturer, pending the report of the Tariff Board, as a basis for further revision in accordance with the exact difference between the cost of production in this and competing countries.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to say it was understood that any member of the committee might file personal views, either singly or in connection with other members, when the measure was reported. I should like to reserve that right to myself, as a member of the committee. I am not yet really determined in regard to it.

Now, I desire to say something else. Inasmuch as the door has been opened a part of the way, in regard to the committee's work, it is well enough that it should be opened sufficiently so that there may be no false impressions in regard to it.

The vote on the resolution or motion which I had the honor to introduce—that this bill be reported adversely—resulted in a tie vote, and I do not desire it to appear that I favored either a favorable report or the report that has been made. I believe that it was the duty of the committee, if they could not agree, that they should do nothing. That is my idea.

Mr. DIXON. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to know how this committee viewed the bill. Three leading Democratic members of the committee have filed a report favoring its adoption. The Republican Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has just filed and had read a very argumentative discourse to show why it should not be adopted. As I understand it, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], another Republican Member, is against the passage of the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I moved that it be reported adversely.

Mr. DIXON. Yes. How did the committee stand? Were the Republican members for the bill or the Democratic members for it?

Mr. HEYBURN. It stood 7 to 7 on the motion which I made that it be reported adversely.

Mr. DIXON. But how was the committee divided as to the Republican membership, which supposedly represents the policy of protection, and as to the Democratic membership, which supposedly leans toward free trade?

Mr. HEYBURN. I can not speak of any other member.

Mr. DIXON. I want to know what is the policy of the Republican Party as represented by the Finance Committee.

Mr. BAILEY. Which part of the Republican Party?

Mr. DIXON. Any part of it.

Mr. LODGE. I desire merely to say in reply to the Senator from Montana that I made the motion to report the bill favorably, and that motion was voted down in the committee by a vote of 8 to 6. That vote of 6 was composed of 3 Democrats and 3 Republicans.

Mr. DIXON. Is there any objection to stating to the Senate who they were?

Mr. LODGE. Three Democrats joined in the report. I have not the slightest objection to stating what has been already stated in every newspaper in the country, that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] and myself were the three Republicans who helped compose the six who were defeated on that motion. Some Senators have filed individual minority reports. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has filed an individual report in favor of the bill. Those Republicans who voted for a favorable report will, in their own time and method, say what they have to say in defense of their position. They did not think it necessary to file their views in the form of a report. The chairman of the committee was, of course, debarred from doing that because the action of the committee bound him, and the action of the committee was that he should report the bill without recommendation. He had no right, therefore, to make a report.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Massachusetts, as I understand it, then——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will yield to the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON], inasmuch as he had the floor.

Mr. DIXON. Then Mississippi and Massachusetts and Pennsylvania struck hands in reporting the bill favorably to the Senate.

Mr. BAILEY. And left Montana out.

Mr. DIXON. And Montana is out.

Mr. PENROSE. I presume the resolution of the Legislature of Montana in favor of reciprocity had weight with some of the Republican members of the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. DIXON. If the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] wants a history of the Montana Legislature, I will give it to him.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in the hope that what I say may comfort my friend from Montana [Mr. DIXON], I wish to say to him that I always am a consistent protectionist.

Mr. DIXON. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I opposed the bill to the best of my ability in committee, and I shall vote against it here. The Senator from Montana will recall that in the last Congress, with a pressure that was almost unprecedented, particularly from Massachusetts, I voted with the western Senators to keep the duty on hides, and I believe now that duty ought never to have been taken from hides.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is because the Senator believes that it is opposed to the theory of protection.

Mr. GALLINGER. I believe it is, if I understood the Senator correctly. The Democratic leader in the House of Representatives has somewhat openly declared that this takes out the foundation stone from the doctrine of protection; that they have started on a movement that will absolutely destroy protection in the country. I believe that to be the fact, and I think the Senator is cooperating to bring that about.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. And that is the reason the Senator from New Hampshire is opposed to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] has the floor.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think the Member referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire is a prophet, subject to the condition that there are enough Republicans in this country to defeat the destruction of the temple. That is the condition that will prevent it. I made no reference to any party organization. I spoke of Republicans, and it is the Republicans that vote, and not the organization.

Mr. President, my only purpose in retaining the floor was that I might make this statement. When the press sent out an account of the proceedings had in committee with reference to this bill after the hearings had closed, it made no proper or truthful statement as to the vote on the question of an adverse report—accidental probably—but they seemed to think that the country was not at all interested in knowing that the committee voted seven to seven on a direct motion to report the bill adversely.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it was my intention to submit some remarks upon this agreement during the afternoon, but I understand there is to be a caucus. So I desire to give notice that to-morrow I shall submit some remarks on the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, as I intend at an early day to address the Senate in opposition to this measure, I have not deemed it necessary to file any views upon it, and I shall not now detain the Senate longer than to say that I can demonstrate, and I shall demonstrate on the floor of the Senate, that in respect to its principal items this bill affords the manufacturers a larger protection than does the existing law. I shall not attempt that demonstration by an elaborate argument to which Senators may make a reply, but by a simple process of addition and subtraction I can make it plain to the people of this country that this treaty lodges a large per cent of what it takes from the Government in the pockets of the manufacturer, while it passes a small remnant over to the consumer. If I can make that demonstration, I shall have no difficulty in satisfying my Democratic constituents, and, what is more important to me, I shall have no difficulty in satisfying my Democratic conscience for my opposition to the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, not by way of confession nor by way of avoidance, I will say that I may or may not before this bill is placed upon its final passage submit my views. More than likely I shall not except by my vote. That has been my course in the Senate almost without deviation for many years, because I have felt that each Member of the Senate could well form his own views from his own investigation and is not often moved, although sometimes probably he is persuaded, by the arguments and investigation of others.

So far as this report is concerned, as a member of the committee I have no desire to file my individual views. As a member of the committee I thought the Senate was entitled to the considerate and mature judgment of that committee on the merits of the proposition that was presented to it. Upon the motion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] that the bill be reported unfavorably to the Senate I voted "yea"; upon the motion, which I think was offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], that the bill be favorably reported to the Senate, I voted "nay"; upon the motion that was subsequently made, that the bill be reported to the Senate without recommendation, I voted "nay," because I believed that up to that time the committee had not discussed the matter sufficiently after the evidence had been in, so that we were justified in depriving the Senate of the results of our mature deliberations if they should be of any value.

Mr. President, I have not changed by opinion since that vote was had in the committee. Whether or not I shall change it in the future, depends upon the investigation which I myself shall make. All my inclinations will be against changing the view, because I have believed as I have scanned this bill that it is a direct blow at the Republican doctrine of a protective tariff. I hope that the deliberations of the Senate will result in a wise conclusion. That conclusion I shall not challenge when it is registered, but I shall hope that the conclusion reached by the Senate will coincide with the view that I now hold.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I do not propose to make any statement to-day further than that I am in favor of the bill and shall so vote, unless I become converted before the discussion is over and convinced that I was in the wrong.

I rise now to state that it has been suggested that there is to be a caucus this afternoon, and I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois withdraw his motion?

Mr. CULLOM. I do, for the present.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I wish to say that I would not offer, and I shall not favor, any amendment to the Canadian agreement that would probably effect its defeat or imperil its final passage. I shall vote for that measure, no matter what form it may assume, if it reduces a single duty on a single article, and I will not aid in tying any sinkers upon that agreement.

I shall, Mr. President, however, propose an amendment to place the following articles on the free list: Flour, meal, dressed meats, packing-house products, and farming implements, the product of Canada when imported into the United States from the Dominion of Canada. This amendment is in harmony with the spirit of the agreement and is not at war with its motive or its object. If we treat the Canadians better than they ask, if we treat the Canadians better than they expect, that can constitute no ground of complaint. An amendment which will treat the American consumer better than the pending measure would constitute no complaint on the part of our own citizenship. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask that it be printed and lie upon the table.

I wish merely to add, Mr. President, that I shall be governed by circumstances in pressing the amendment upon the consideration of the Senate. If I find the amendment can be adopted, and that the measure so amended can pass the Senate, I shall then invite its consideration by this body; but if the adoption of this amendment would imperil the passage of the bill, I shall not press the amendment and I would not support the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed to be offered by the Senator from Oklahoma will be printed and lie upon the table.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a number of Senators have expressed the desire to have the opportunity to examine the question which was discussed this afternoon as to the right of the President of the Senate to cast the deciding vote on the amendment offered to the proposition to amend the Constitution. I want to say now that when I made the suggestion on yesterday that I doubted the right of the President of the Senate to vote on that question, I said then, and repeat now, that it is a matter upon which I have arrived at no final conclusion, but I thought it a question of such gravity as to merit consideration, and to the end that we may all have the opportunity to give it full and fair examination, not only because of its importance with reference to the matter which I may say is yet pending, but with reference to future business of the Senate, I desire to move at this time a reconsideration of the vote taken on the joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution, and also a reconsideration of the vote taken upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair can not recognize the Senator from Missouri to make the second motion. He can recognize him to make the first motion, but the Senator from Missouri voted against the second proposition.

Mr. REED. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri moves to reconsider the vote by which House joint resolution 39 was passed on yesterday.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I take it the Senator from Missouri does not expect action on that motion immediately.

Mr. REED. No, sir; I was about to ask—and I am glad to have the matter settled, Mr. President, as to my right—I was about to ask to have this matter lie upon the table, and I will say now to Senators, some of whom desire to leave the city, that I shall not call it up this week.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that such a motion, when a bill or joint resolution has passed out of the consideration of the Senate, as in this case, must be accompanied by a motion requesting the other House to return the bill or joint resolution, and the latter motion must be acted upon at once under clause 2 of Rule XIII?

Mr. REED. I was not aware of that rule. My attention had not been called to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair read it to the Senator?

Mr. REED. I shall be glad to hear it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule reads:

When a bill, resolution, report, amendment, order, or message, upon which a vote has been taken, shall have gone out of the possession of the Senate and been communicated to the House of Representatives, the motion to reconsider shall be accompanied by a motion to request the House to return the same; which last motion shall be acted upon immediately and without debate, and if determined in the negative shall be a final disposition of the motion to reconsider.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am very much in earnest about the desire to have this question settled right. I intend, so far as I am able, to examine the proposition, and if I conclude that the point is not well taken, to say so in this body. I now ask unanimous consent for the adoption of a motion to recall the joint resolution from the House of Representatives. I fear I have not put it in proper form.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As the Chair understands, then, the Senator from Missouri moves to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed and to request of the House of Representatives a return of the joint resolution.

Mr. REED. That is exactly it. I do not have the rules before me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. And upon the latter motion the Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the request be agreed to. Is there objection?

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made. The question, then, is on agreeing to the motion to ask the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the joint resolution.

Mr. DIXON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. BACON (when Mr. FRYE's name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. I have already voted. I have done so because I have arranged to transfer my pair with the Senator from Maine to my colleague the Senator from Georgia [Mr. TERRELL], so that the Senator from Maine will stand paired with the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER]. As he is not present, I will withhold my vote.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. He being absent, I will withhold my vote.

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. ROOT's name was called). The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], and that pair will stand for the afternoon.

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER]. I do not know how that Senator would vote if present, and I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BRADLEY (after having voted in the negative). I find that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR], with whom I have a general pair, is not present. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted inadvertently. I have a pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS], and I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], and I desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. O'GORMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted inadvertently in the absence of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT], with whom I am paired. If the Senator from Rhode Island were present, he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea." As he is absent, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MYERS. I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES. My colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber. I do not know how he would vote if present.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is paired with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. NEWLANDS. I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 33, as follows:

By Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas (for Mr. PERCY):

A bill (S. 2747) for the establishment of a drainage fund and the construction of works for the reclamation of swamp and overflowed lands; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. GALLINGER:

A bill (S. 2748) for the relief of Clara Dougherty, Ernest Kubel, and Josephine Taylor, owners of lot No. 13; of Ernest Kubel, owner of lot No. 41; and of Mary Meder, owner of the south 17.10 feet front by the full depth thereof of lot No. 14, all of said property in square No. 724, in Washington, D. C., with regard to assessment and payment for damages on account of change of grade due to the construction of Union Station, in said District (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 2749) authorizing the State Department to deliver to certain persons gifts from the governments of foreign States; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 2750) to amend sections 90, 99, 105, and 186 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. STONE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 35) in reference to the employment of enlisted men in competition with local civilians; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, June 14, 1911, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 13, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite Spirit, Father of all souls, whose wisdom, power, and goodness are everywhere apparent, upholding, sustaining, guiding the works of Thy hands, a potent factor in shaping and guiding the destiny of men and of nations, help us to put ourselves in rapport with Thee, that we may become instruments in furthering Thy plans, that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendment, joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. J. Res. 39. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2355. An act extending the time for payment of balance due on purchase price of a certain tract of land.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia will state his point of order.

Mr. BARTLETT. My point of order, Mr. Speaker, is whether the House can receive a message from the Senate when the Senate is not in session and will not be in session until 2 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on his point of order?

Mr. BARTLETT. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. It has been ruled both ways.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have no doubt the Chair is familiar with it, and I am content to make the point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is suggesting to the gentleman that the rulings have been both ways.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am aware of that. I make the point of order that the Senate is not now in session, and that a message can not be received by one House from the other when the House purporting to send the message is not in session.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BARTLETT. I have finished what I wished to say. I merely make the point.

Mr. MANN. As the Chair has suggested, the former rulings were that neither House could receive a message from the other while the House sending the message was not in session; that the House could not receive a message from the Senate unless the Senate was in session; but the uniform practice of both Houses for many years has been to receive messages, regardless of whether the House that sent the message was in session at the time or not. It seems to me that uniform practice has acquired the force and dignity of a rule and a ruling on the subject.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, my recollection of the rule, which I have not before me, is that that is true, where no point of order is made upon it, and where the rule is not invoked; but that it has been uniformly held, when the point of order has been made, or the attention of the Chair has been called to the fact from the floor, that the message could not be received. Of course any rule, by unanimous consent or acquiescence, may not be enforced.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Georgia to help clear up the situation. What is the reason why the House should not receive a message from the Senate when the Senate happens not to be in session more than at any other time?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, it contemplates that each House is to convey the information to the other House while it is in session. If you can say that one House may adjourn for three hours or four hours, then you may say it may adjourn for three days and convey its messages to the other while not in session. It is not a matter of time; it is a matter of the observance of the rule.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the gentleman how the Speaker of the House would have official notice that the Senate was not in session at the particular moment when the message was received here?

Mr. BARTLETT. That being the rule, it is presumed that the House from which the message is conveyed is in session, and when a message is received in either House, the presiding officer of that House will presume that the other House is in session; but the Journal of the Senate and the RECORD of both Houses inform the Speaker that the Senate is not now in session, and that it will not be until 2 o'clock to-day.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will yield, we have not the Journal of the Senate before us.

Mr. BARTLETT. We have the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. We have the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but the gentleman would not claim that a statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD was binding in reference to the matter at all. That is not the Journal.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; but the Speaker is informed that the Senate is not in session.

Mr. MANN. Informed by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose the message was brought in at 2.30, what right would the Speaker have to assume that the Senate was still in session because it was in session at 2 o'clock? Or, suppose it was brought in at 6 o'clock, there being no regular hour for the Senate to adjourn.

Mr. BARTLETT. Answering the question of the gentleman from Nebraska, the law presumes that both Houses of Congress will, through their public officials, perform the duty and will follow the law and the rules of the Senate and the House. That may be in some instances a violent presumption, but it is a presumption that will apply to the officials of Congress as well as to other public officers.

Mr. NORRIS. Last night, I believe, the Senate did not adjourn until after 9 o'clock. The House was in session at 12 o'clock. It had adjourned the day before to meet at 12 o'clock. Suppose a message had been brought into the Senate at 9 o'clock p. m. from the House, what information would the Senate have that the House was not still in session?

Mr. BARTLETT. The presumption——

Mr. NORRIS. Would the presumption prevail that the House continued in session until the contrary appeared?

Mr. BARTLETT. There is a presumption that the officers of the House—the Clerk who conveys the message of the House to the Senate, or the Secretary of the Senate, who conveys the message of the Senate to the House—will conform to the rules and do their duty in accordance with the rules and in accordance with the law; but when the attention of the Chair is directed to the fact that the House from which the message comes is not in session, that presumption is overcome by proof, and when that is admitted, then the rule can be enforced.

Mr. HULL rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question to ascertain the effect of his point. He says the Speaker would presume that the Senate was in session.

Mr. BARTLETT. I said that the Speaker would presume that the officials of the Senate performed their duty in accordance with the law and the rules.

Mr. HULL. Suppose the House should receive a message from the Senate under these circumstances in the absence of official notice that the Senate is in session, and afterwards the presumption should be rebutted and overcome, showing that the message was received when the Senate was not in session. What would be the effect on the official action of the House on the message it had received?

Mr. BARTLETT. The same effect that is given to our action in the House or in the Senate, where certain things are permitted to be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman's position is that that would not vitiate the action of the House upon the message received by the Senate without official notice that it was or was not in session.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; unless it appeared that the Senate had adjourned for more than three days.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In order to get the exact point the gentleman is making, I would like to ask him this question: Suppose the Senate had met at 12 o'clock, and 5 minutes thereafter had recessed until 2 o'clock; and suppose the gentleman had been in the Senate at that time, and informed the House that the Senate had in effect recessed until 2 o'clock. Would he make the point of order that the message could not be received?

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not think that a recess is equivalent to adjournment. The Senate would be tentatively in session. A mere recess is not equivalent to an adjournment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But the Senate would not be in session.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; it would be in recess, though.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has made a point of order that the House can not receive a message from the Senate, after the message has been received and the papers have been transmitted to and are in the hands of the House. If the gentleman's point of order should be sustained, holding that the House can not receive a message which it has received, what becomes of the original papers?

Mr. BARTLETT. The original papers, I apprehend, would go back to the Senate and be properly transmitted.

Mr. MANN. The Clerk of the House is in possession of the papers. He can not put the papers out of his hands without authority from the House.

Mr. BARTLETT. As soon as the message was read and before the papers passed out of the hands of the messenger, I was on my feet and made the point of order.

Mr. MANN. But, Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman should have made his point of order before the message was read, because the message is received by the House, and the papers are received by the House. The only copy that is in existence of the original papers is now in the possession of the House. The House can not throw them in the wastebasket as it can an original bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, time and time again we have papers which have been received and placed in the hands of the officers of this House and of the Senate, which have been returned by resolution.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Let me get through. Now, the effect of this is, if the Speaker sustains the point of order, to have a motion made to return the papers to the Senate, with instructions that they were presented to the House while the Senate was not in session, and I apprehend upon the Senate being informed of that state of affairs, the Senate would transmit them in order and according to the rules. I am content that my friend, who is sometimes technical, always fair——

Mr. MANN. Oh, I think it is the gentleman from Georgia who is technical this morning.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am in this particular; I do not deny it; and the gentleman from Illinois has taught me many things about being technical about matters here; and we all will give him the credit of being a past master on the subject of technicality. Now, I am content if that is the position the gentleman occupies—that I was not active enough in presenting an objection—which shows that the gentleman from Illinois is of the opinion that in order to avoid the enforcement of the rule you will have to be lively hereafter.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Georgia yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Suppose the Senate, being in session, sent its Secretary over with its message, and when he is halfway across the hall the Senate adjourns, so that by the time he delivers his message in the House the Senate shall not be in session. What would the gentleman say in a case of that kind?

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I would say that if that fact were brought to the attention of the officer, he ought not to present the message; and if it be brought to the attention of the House, the House ought not to receive it. That is what I would say.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia makes a highly technical point of order. While I think the Speaker is justified or would be justified in overruling the point of order, even if it were made at the proper time, it is the universal rule that when a man appeals to a technicality he must observe the technicalities himself.

What is the point of order? That a message after it has been received can not be received. But, Mr. Speaker, it has been received. If the gentleman wanted to make a point of order that we could not receive a message from the Senate at this time, he should have made the point of order when the Speaker announced that the House would receive a message from the Senate and before the message was received. The message has been received. The House is in possession physically of the only papers that are in existence on this subject, and the House can not get rid of its possession without passing some kind of resolution and sending them back to the Senate. If the point of order be sustained, I suppose there will be offered a resolution, "Resolved, That the papers so-and-so be returned to the Senate because the House did not know enough to receive them at the proper time." We have the possession of the papers. That is not all. We want the possession of the papers so that we can act upon them.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, has the Chair any doubt about what the correct ruling in this case is or what he ought to decide?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no doubt about how he is going to rule. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I asked that question for the purpose of saying that I have no doubt that the Chair entertains the same opinion that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] does and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] does, and that I think about nine-tenths of the membership of this House entertain on this question.

The SPEAKER. The situation about the parliamentary rulings on this point is as follows: Jefferson's Manual declares that both Houses have to be sitting in order that one may receive a message from the other. Speaker Crisp overruled that proposition. Speaker Reed subsequently sustained it. The reason in the matter is with Speaker Crisp's ruling; otherwise it would compel the Speaker, or whoever happened to be occupying the chair, to convert himself into a committee of inquiry every time a message came over here to see whether the Senate was actually in session. In addition to this, during my 17 years' service here I have never once heard the point raised. Messages from the Senate have been uniformly received and no questions asked as to whether the Senate was in session. Usage has made it a rule to receive Senate messages when presented to the House. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will state it.

Mr. MANN. Is it in order at this time to move to agree to the Senate amendment?

The SPEAKER. That motion will be in order when the Chair lays this motion before the House.

Mr. MANN. Will the Chair lay the message before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not yet; no.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I hope the Chair will not lay it before the House at this particular moment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman's remark.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I said I hoped the Chair will not lay the message before the House at this particular moment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11019, a bill to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman from Alabama to withhold that motion until I make a request for unanimous consent. I would like to ask unanimous consent of the House——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will withhold my motion for that purpose.

PRINTING AND BINDING—COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 203.

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department be authorized to have such printing and binding done as shall be necessary for the transaction of its business during the Sixty-second Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman why that is not reported by the Committee on Printing, so as to come before the House in a regular manner?

Mr. HARDY. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois I understood the other day his position in this matter, but I thought, upon a brief statement, that he would see that it would be merely a consumption of time to refer this to the Committee on Printing. The other Committees on Expenditures on the different departments have asked and received unanimous consent for the passage of a similar resolution. We were not sure our committee would at this term take such testimony as would call for any printing and we did not ask for such action of the House until we saw that we were going to take some testimony. It is simply the same resolution that has been adopted in reference to every one of these Expenditure Committees except this committee.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but a part of these resolutions were adopted on report of the Committee on Printing. I take it, from reading the printed bill form, that it was referred to the Committee on Printing. Why does not the Committee on Printing report it?

Mr. HARDY. I will state to the gentleman that the bill was introduced by me on a blank form, with the intention of calling it up yesterday. The form had Mr. ASHBROOK'S name on it, and while I sent to the desk and inquired for my resolution to get it back, forgetting that it had Mr. ASHBROOK'S name on it, I failed to find it and supposed it had been mislaid. However, it was referred as a resolution offered by Mr. ASHBROOK. In reality Mr. ASHBROOK introduced no resolution, and so I introduced this resolution this morning.

Mr. MANN. I understood the Speaker to state the other day—and I have no criticism if the Speaker so stated and has changed his position, and I wish to be informed if I misunderstood the Speaker—that he would not recognize these resolutions for unanimous consent any longer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is entirely correct; but this was merely a matter about printing, and the chairman of the committee not being here, or any member, I told the gentleman I would recognize him; but the Chair desires to restate the proposition that the rule provides a Unanimous Consent Calendar, and the way to get on it is to put a resolution in the basket and let it take its proper course.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I recognize the position both of the gentleman from Illinois and of yourself, but it was the peculiar condition that caused me to ask this.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves to discharge the Committee on Printing from the further consideration of the resolution reported by the Clerk and asks unanimous consent for its present consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Has the resolution ever been to the Committee on Printing?

The SPEAKER. It was referred yesterday to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Well, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, with all due respect to the gentleman from Texas, that it is rather early to move to discharge the committee, is it not?

The SPEAKER. This is the old procedure by unanimous consent. It is the correct and technical way of getting at it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I understand the motion now is to discharge the committee from further consideration of this resolution?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to discharge the committee and bring the resolution up. That is the old form. The gentleman from Texas did not state it, but the Chair volunteered to state it for him.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. And now he is asking unanimous consent to make a motion to discharge the committee?

The SPEAKER. He is asking unanimous consent that the committee be discharged and that the matter be considered now.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Then I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman withhold one moment? I do not know whether the situation stated by the Speaker is the attitude I am in or not. A similar resolution was introduced by me yesterday which had the name of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK] on it. I sought the Clerk in order to withdraw it and reintroduce it this morning, but on account of it being in the name of the gentleman from Ohio the Clerk could not find the resolution. Now, this morning I do not ask anything from the resolution that got referred in that way and was so referred, but have just now introduced a resolution in my own name and ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] objects, and that is the end of it.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman from Florida objected to the discharge of the committee.

The SPEAKER. You are bound to have a discharge of that committee if it had been referred to the committee.

Mr. HARDY. The resolution referred to the committee was a resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK]. My resolution was introduced this morning. I sent up the resolution——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will restate the question to the House, then. The Chair supposed it was the resolution which the gentleman had up here yesterday afternoon.

Mr. HARDY. No.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which the Clerk has reported.

Mr. HARDY. And introduced this morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to state that while I have no possible objection to this order being made, at the same time, if we have rules regulating procedure here, I can not see any reason why that rule should not be followed in this instance. I would like to ask the gentleman why the necessity of any particular haste in this matter? Why could it not go over for a reasonable time, until the Committee on Printing has an opportunity to consider it?

Mr. HARDY. The question is perfectly proper, and I do not mind stating to the gentleman that these committees on expenditures have all adopted this method without objection and have had similar resolutions passed. I did not include my committee nor ask for that resolution until I found we would need to have some printing done. We had a hearing yesterday and we expect to have one to-morrow. We are right in the position where we want those things printed, and finding that we were going into some inquiries and taking some testimony, I thought this simple, ordinary resolution that has been adopted with reference to every other one of these committees was proper, and certainly most expeditious.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Then there is an existing necessity for this order now?

Mr. HARDY. There is.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Then I do not object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ELLERBE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to say that my colleague [Mr. FINLEY], the chairman of this committee, is detained at home because of important business and sickness, and I would like to hear the resolution read. I would like to know what it is.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 203.

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department be authorized to have such printing and binding done as shall be necessary for the transaction of its business during the Sixty-second Congress.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to state to the gentleman that it is a similar resolution to those that have been passed in reference to all the other committees on expenditures.

Mr. ELLERBE. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

THE WOOL SCHEDULE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 11019, to reduce the tariff on wool and woolen goods.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, with Mr. HAY in the chair.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for one hour.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, it is a little less than two years since we had a general revision of the tariff and the present tariff law was placed upon the statute book. It is universally conceded, I think, that that law received very careful consideration; that the committee of the House having in charge the framing of the bill spent months in gathering testimony; that all parties who desired to be heard had an opportunity to be heard, and that such data and statistics as were necessary to be had in the making of a tariff law were had by the committee. When the law went upon the statute book the President of the United States declared it to be the best tariff law that had ever been written.

It is not contended that it is a perfect law. No perfect tariff law ever was or ever will be written. But it is a wise law, drawn along the lines of Republican policy, which seeks to secure protection for all our industries, to preserve our home market for our own people, and to raise such revenues as may be necessary to carry on the current operations of the Government. During the short time that it has been in operation it has vindicated itself in the revival of business and in the repletion of a somewhat depleted Treasury.

Like all tariff laws, it was no sooner enacted than it met with abuse—unintelligent and ill-merited abuse. It was abused by the Democratic Party, which sought by such abuse to make political capital. It was abused by the doctrinaires, college professors, free traders, men of books and of theories. It was abused in the muckraking magazines, of which unfortunately we have a goodly number. It was abused especially in the American press. The publishers' associations and the newspapers desiring to secure free print paper joined in a crusade, and continue in a crusade, for further tariff revision.

But, unlike previous demands for further tariff revision, this was coupled with a demand for a change in the method of revision. It was said that the parties who appear before the committee of the House having in charge the making of a tariff bill are interested parties, and therefore that no accurate or impartial conclusion can be arrived at from their testimony; that duties are liable to be discriminatory and to the advantage of private interests. It was claimed that the making of a tariff requires such accurate and scientific knowledge as can be possessed only by those who have given time and special study to the subject. It was contended that the Congress in the making of a tariff ought to have the aid of a permanent scientific bureau whose business it should be at all times to be possessed of the facts necessary and convenient in the imposition of import duties; so that from all sides there came up a demand for the creation of a Tariff Board.

The President of the United States advocated the creation of such a board. The manufacturers' associations and other associations of a like character entered upon a crusade to secure legislation which should result in the creating of such a board. In the Senate bills were introduced for the creation of a tariff commission. Like bills were introduced in the House of Representatives for the creation of a tariff commission, and finally a bill creating a Tariff Board was unanimously reported from the Committee on Ways and Means. It received at that time the indorsement of the gentleman who is now the Speaker of the House of Representatives. It received at that time the indorsement of the gentleman who is now the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and the leader of his party upon the floor of the House. It passed the House and went to the Senate. It passed the Senate with an amendment and came back to the House, and failed only in the closing hours of the last session because of a Democratic filibuster.

Congress, however, in the last sundry civil appropriation bill and in the sundry civil appropriation bill preceding the last had made a large appropriation for the use of such a board, and the consequence was that the President, thus authorized by congressional action, appointed a Tariff Board such as was contemplated by the bill that failed, consisting in the first instance of three gentlemen and subsequently of five gentlemen. This board has been organized. It has for some considerable time been pursuing the duties for which it was organized, and so far as the question now before the House involved in this particular bill is concerned has made announcement that it will be ready to report upon the wool and woolen schedules at the meeting of Congress at its regular session in December next.

As a matter of fact the paragraph in the appropriation bill which makes the appropriation for the use of this board provides that their report shall be made at the beginning of the next session of Congress.

Such was the condition of things when the President in his wisdom saw fit to enter into a reciprocity agreement with Canada, the consummation of which required the approval of Congress, and as a consequence we are now, at his call, engaged in business at an extraordinary session of Congress.

The Democratic Party saw in this extraordinary session, called to pass on the reciprocity agreement, an opportunity to play politics, and they have brought into this House the pending bill. It has been made in secret, without any person having an opportunity to be heard, without any additional information upon the part of the committee to that which was gathered in the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee two years ago. It has been indorsed by a Democratic caucus, so that it is now here for mere perfunctory discussion, with the certainty in advance of us that it will be passed without any amendment, without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i."

Precisely the same objections that have heretofore been made to the methods by which tariff legislation is prepared are applicable to this bill.

In one of the issues of the North American Review in the fall of the year 1909 there appeared a scathing denunciation of the Payne tariff law. One of the paragraphs of that article read as follows:

> The methods by which tariff bills are constructed have now become all too familiar and throw a significant light on the character of the legislation involved. Debate in the Houses has little or nothing to do with it. The process by which such a bill is made is private, not public; because the reasons which underlie many of the rates imposed are private. The stronger faction of the Ways and Means Committee of the House makes up the preliminary bill, with the assistance of "experts," whom it permits the industries most concerned to supply for its guidance. The controlling members of the committee also determine what amendments, if any, shall be accepted, either from the minority faction of the committee or from the House itself. It permits itself to be dictated to, if at all, only by the imperative action of a party caucus.

No more accurate arraignment could be written of the methods by which this bill has been brought into this House than is to be found in that paragraph of that publication in the North American Review. It came from the pen of the gentleman who has lately exiled himself from the serene atmosphere of the academic shades of classic Princeton to become the peripatetic governor of New Jersey. [Applause on the Republican side.] And he, who has been writing backwards the record of a heretofore sane and respectable life, may very well be believed, as reported by the public press, to be willing to put his seal of approval upon this political bill.

This bill is indefensible from any standpoint. There is an old saw to the effect that history repeats itself. Previous to this occasion never but once since the Civil War has the Democratic Party had an opportunity to construct a tariff bill.

That opportunity occurred during the administration of President Cleveland, when all departments of the Government were in the hands of the Democratic Party. The result of their efforts at that time was the passage of the Wilson bill,

What its doleful record is is a matter of history. It was a failure because it was neither one thing nor another; it was neither a protective bill nor a bill for revenue. It was a bill made to fool the people, and the people recognized its hypocrisy. The greatest living Democrat of that day set upon it the seal of his disapproval. There are men in this House, I have no doubt, who will recollect, as I do, with what a sensation the House listened to a letter written by President Cleveland to Mr. Wilson, the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, in which he said:

Every true Democrat and every sincere tariff reformer knows that this bill in its present form and as it will be submitted to the conference falls far short of the consummation for which we have long labored, for which we have suffered defeat without discouragement, which in its anticipation gave us a rallying cry in our day of triumph, and which on its promise of accomplishment is so interwoven with Democratic pledges and Democratic success that our abandonment of the cause or the principles upon which it rests means party perfidy and party dishonor.

And now, again, the Democratic Party, being in possession of power in this House, undertakes to frame a tariff bill, and brings in for our consideration the bill which is now pending; and again, as on that prior occasion, the greatest living Democrat hastens to set upon it the seal of his disapproval and to accuse his party of hypocrisy. [Applause on the Republican side.] Speaking before the Democratic caucus had been held, the peerless leader, William Jennings Bryan, said——

Mr. MANN. There seems to be no applause from the other side at his name.

Mr. DALZELL. No; he seems to be now down and out in this House.

A MEMBER. Temporarily.

Mr. DALZELL. Yes; temporarily I accept the amendment.

Mr. Bryan said:

It is possible that some of the Democrats believe in the principle of protection. The larceny—the "robbery under the form of law"—embodied in the protective system is indorsed by many good Republicans who have not yet learned to apply to legislation the rules that they apply in everyday life; and some Democrats may have become pupils in this school, especially those who have among their constituents influential beneficiaries of the system. But the Democratic voters have a right to insist that the protectionist Democrats shall be as honest as the protectionist Republicans. The Republicans want protection on wool because they believe in the principle of protection; let no Democratic advocate of a tax on wool masquerade behind the pretense that he is voting for a revenue tariff; let him not add hypocrisy to the sin which he commits against his party.

Mr. Bryan, however, defeated in caucus, was not willing to quit the contest, and I call your attention now to what he says since that defeat.

In the Commoner of June 9, 1911, appeared an article headed "Not the Democratic idea," and which reads as follows:

The United Press on June 2 carried the following dispatch: "I think we have proved that the Democracy of the Nation can be handled beneath the dome of the Capitol without assistance," declared UNDERWOOD to-day, discussing the defeat of the Bryan faction. "We adopted the wool bill unanimously, despite Mr. Bryan's earnest opposition, and we will put it through."

It is not the Democratic idea that "the Democracy of the Nation be handled beneath the dome of the Capitol" or among a coterie of men.

The Democracy of the Nation can not be "handled" and live.

It was "handling" that brought the Republican Party to its present bad plight.

If the Democratic Party is to be of real service to the public interests rather than the slave of special interests, it will be controlled by the voice and conscience of the rank and file and in accordance with the party's principles.

But Mr. Bryan had something to say as to the caucus resolution, as follows:

FREE WOOL INDORSED.

The caucus that indorsed the Underwood bill adopted the following resolution:

Be it resolved, That the bill revising Schedule K, as presented to this caucus by the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee, is not to be construed as an abandonment of any Democratic policy, but in view of a gradual reduction of the tariff and the depleted and depleting condition of the Public Treasury as a result of Republican extravagance, a tariff of 20 per cent ad valorem on raw wool is now proposed as a revenue necessity.

The first part of the resolution rebukes those who deny that free wool is a Democratic doctrine—how do the protectionists like that? The last part contradicts those who argue that a tax on wool is not a necessity. Like all compromises it displeases both sides—puts both sides in a false position. The protectionist Democrats will repudiate it at the first opportunity, and the advocates of free wool will disregard it as soon as they get a chance to substitute a tax on something else. It will answer one purpose, namely, keep the protection Democrats from airing their views on protection during the discussion of the bill—thanks for small favors—and it will give the Republicans a chance to point out ways in which the Democrats could have collected more tax with less oppression.

Its temporary purpose is to disinfect the action of the caucus—

[Laughter on the Republican side.]

but its future value will be in showing up the false basis on which the protectionist Democrats won their victory in the caucus.

Mr. Bryan in that same issue—he seems to have been full of the subject—says something more in an article headed, "A backward step." He said:

The Underwood bill has been indorsed by a Democratic caucus and will pass as it was reported, unless Republican ridicule shames the Democrats into amending the bill. The manner in which the resolution was received by the opposition when it was read in the House ought to give the Democratic Members some idea of the mortification which will be felt by Democrats throughout the country when they have to meet the jeers and taunts of the Republican protectionists. The Underwood bill leaves a 20 per cent tax on wool. This is a step backward at a time when the tariff-reform sentiment of the country is moving forward. The Democrats put wool upon the free-list bill nearly 20 years ago. Mr. UNDERWOOD defends the 20 per cent tax as a revenue measure and insists that it is necessary. That is the way most protective tariffs are defended. The Commoner does not accept Mr. UNDERWOOD'S reasons and does not believe that the country will. It is absurd to argue that the tax on wool is necessary; the amount levied on wool could be collected with less hardship from other things. It is a conservative estimate to say that the tax on wool will cost the people from one hundred to two hundred millions, or at least from five to ten times as much as it brings into the Treasury. The less than fourteen millions which will be collected on wool could be collected from a 10 per cent duty on raw silk and raw rubber—not to speak of other methods. But, instead of relieving the consumers of woolens to the extent they might have done, the followers of Mr. UNDERWOOD sound a retreat on the wool question, and they did it in the name of a revenue tariff. Many honest men have been misled by Mr. UNDERWOOD'S specious argument, but the Commoner asks these Democrats to watch the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

I do not read the rest of it because it is personal in its nature.

But Mr. Bryan's rebuke and his statement of the situation were not necessary. The Democratic Party in this House had already announced the falsity of their situation. They started this bill on its devious course, first, with an apology, and then, secondly, with a plain, palpable misstatement as to facts. This resolution, quoted by Mr. Bryan and adopted in caucus, confesses that the bill is not in accord with Democratic policy. It confesses that construction is necessary in order to make it conform to Democratic policies, and it goes on to make the plain, palpably false statement that it is necessary in order to raise money to fill the Treasury, depleted by Republican extravagance. I know of no more humiliating spectacle—and I measure my words—I know of no more humiliating spectacle than that which was witnessed when the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, in his opening speech on the bill, persisted as against advice time and again in repeating a statement that, with the papers before him, if he had known how to read them, would have told him was absolutely false. [Applause on the Republican side.] I shall not do the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] any injustice. I shall read his language as it fell from his own lips and was taken by the Official Reporters of the House. It is as follows:

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hold in my hand the statement of the United States Treasury at the close of business June 5, 1911. It came to us all in the mail this morning; and what does it show? It shows that for the year 1910—the fiscal year ending the 30th day of last June—the ordinary receipts of this Government were $675,000,000 and the ordinary disbursements of this Government, which excludes, of course, the disbursements in reference to the Panama Canal and the bonded indebtedness, amounted to $659,000,000. This Treasury statement makes the estimate of ordinary receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911—and these are not our figures; they are prepared by a department of a Republican administration—and they say that the ordinary receipts for this fiscal year will amount to $625,000,000, as against $675,000,000 last year, a difference of $50,000,000.

Is there any gentleman—

Mr. UNDERWOOD says—

on that side of the House who can say that that does not show a depleting condition of the Public Treasury, a falling off of the ordinary receipts? What does "ordinary receipts" mean? It means those receipts which the Government gets out of the customhouses, those moneys it receives from internal-revenue taxes, those moneys it receives from miscellaneous sources, including all the moneys you receive except for the sale of Government bonds. This report shows that you are to-day, or will be at the end of this fiscal year, on the 1st day of next July, $50,000,000 behind the receipts of last year.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. Will he turn to the second page of that Treasury statement—I suppose it is an ordinary daily statement?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. And read there that the receipts up to date for this fiscal year are more by several million dollars than they were up to date last year.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I do not see that on the figures, because I have not got——

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman will find it if he looks for it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Here is what he says; to this date for the last fiscal year the receipts are $604,000,000. Now, I have not got a statement before me showing what they were up to the 5th day of June, 1910, last year, but what I do say—and I have not got both of those figures—is that your Republican administration, the Treasury Department of the United States, says that you will be $50,000,000 behind the receipts of last year when you reach the 1st day of July [applause on the Democratic side], and yet you say we are not warranted in making the statement that there is a depleting condition in the Treasury.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman must be reading from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made last December, when he was predicting what the receipts would or might be.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I am not.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, yes; and when the department publishes daily and sends to every Member of the House from day to day a statement of the receipts up to date for each year, there is no excuse for the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means making such a statement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But I hold in my hand the excuse for making it, and it can not be denied, and if the gentleman wants to see it, he can send here and get the paper. It is the daily statement, the last issued by the Treasury Department [applause on the Democratic side], bearing date June 5, and it says that you are going to be $50,000,000 behind at the end of this fiscal year. Now, if that is not a depleting condition of the Public Treasury, I do not know what it is. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

[Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I read from the statement which the gentleman from Alabama hands me, receipts and disbursements $625,071,413.90. That is for the fiscal year up to this date, in June, and in the next column to this date last fiscal year, $604,048,107. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, as I stated to the gentleman repeatedly, it is not to this date whether there is going to be a deficit. I gave the ordinary receipts for the entire fiscal year of last year, and it is here in the column, $675,000,000. The gentleman does not deny that the ordinary receipts are $675,000,000?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I challenge any man on that side of the House to get that statement and read it, in view of the gentleman's speech, and say whether I am right or not. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, the gentleman is trying to prove his case by taking a particular period and comparing it with last year. The gentleman can not deny that the ordinary receipts of this Government from taxation sources were $675,000,000 this last year. Does he deny that?

Mr. PAYNE. I have not the statement before me.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, here it is.

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose that the gentleman knows that the tax from corporations is due this month; that it amounts on the assessments to twenty-eight and a half millions of dollars, due before the 30th day of June. I suppose he knows that?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And I suppose your Secretary of the Treasury, when he made his estimates of the amount of receipts he was going to get this year, had sense enough to figure that in, if he knew it was coming due. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, with the figures before him, in a statement so plain that any 12-year-old boy could understand it, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] stands up and declares that that statement shows that, due to Republican extravagance, the Government will be behind $50,000,000 this year, when really the statement shows that he has made a mistake in his reading of it. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Here in my hand is the very statement he had before him:

Receipts and disbursements, June 5, 1911.

[1] Excess of disbursements over receipts.

Ordinary receipts and disbursements, in one column "this day," meaning, of course, ordinary receipts and disbursements for the day of the statement, June 5. In the next column "this month," meaning, of course, the receipts and disbursements of the month of June up to the day of the statement, June 5, as before. In the next column "this month last fiscal year," meaning the receipts and disbursements of the month of June, 1910, up to the 5th day thereof. In the next column "This fiscal year ending June 30, 1911," meaning receipts and disbursements of this year up to the day of the statement, June 5. Here is where the gentleman from Alabama gets his $625,000,000 which he persisted in reading, not as receipts for the fiscal year up to June 5, but as estimated receipts for the entire fiscal year up to June 30.

The next column is headed "To this date last fiscal year"—which was notice to the gentleman from Alabama that it showed a comparison between the receipts of June 5, 1910, and those of the date of the statement, June 5, 1911.

With that explanation staring him in the face the gentleman from Alabama defiantly says that the Treasury is depleted by Republican extravagance to the extent of a deficit of $50,000,000 this year.

The gentleman made this extraordinary and, so far as the alleged necessity for the provisions of this bill is concerned, fundamental mistake of $50,000,000 by comparing the receipts of the last fiscal year, $675,000,000, with the receipts of this fiscal year, not up to June 30, but only up to June 5.

Oh, the pity of it! The pity of it, that the leader of a great party should stand up in the presence of his colleagues on both sides of the House and exhibit such ignorance as condemns and makes utterly worthless any measure of which he is the advocate. [Applause on the Republican side.] Why, if I should seek to emphasize——

Mr. HELM rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. DALZELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HELM. If the Treasury of the United States is in the wholesome and healthy condition that you would have the country and the House believe that it is now in, why is it that the Secretary of the Treasury is now preparing and offering for sale 3 per cent Panama bonds?

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, is the gentleman from Kentucky as ignorant as the gentleman from Alabama? Does he not know, as everybody knows, that the Panama Canal is being built, not out of current receipts, but out of bonds, and that the Secretary of the Treasury is pursuing the policy heretofore adopted by Congress without division on either side of the House? [Applause on the Republican side.] He is taking advantage of the market and the necessity of Panama construction to issue bonds. I will not yield to the gentleman if he has no more intelligent question to ask than that.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. HELM. I think that the statement of the gentleman is unfair in certain particulars, at least—not claiming the amount of intelligence, of course, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania confesses——

Mr. DALZELL. I do not yield for a speech, Mr. Chairman. I have answered the gentleman's question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. DALZELL. The issue of Panama bonds at this time has no earthly connection with the healthy or unhealthy condition of the Federal Treasury, and the gentleman ought to know it if he does not know it.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DALZELL. I am talking about the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. I am talking about the reasons assigned by the Committee on Ways and Means, which have no foundation in fact, for the bringing into this House of this bill at this time. And the gentleman's question is not only not intelligent, but it is also irrelevant.

Now, if I should seek to pursue further the attitude of the gentleman from Alabama, I would call attention to some other of these daily statements of the business of the United States Treasury. Here is one for June 9, 1911. If the gentleman from Alabama had had that statement before him on that day, he would have made the statement that our receipts at the end of the year would be $633,000,000 instead of $625,000,000. If he had had before him another daily statement—that of June 8, 1911—he would have made the assertion that our receipts at the end of the year would be $632,000,000 instead of $625,000,000.

And, recurring again to each of these statements, they would have shown the gentleman, if he had seen fit intelligently to read them, that while the receipts of this fiscal year amounted to $625,000,000 on June 5, they had amounted on June 5, 1910, to only $604,000,000.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DALZELL. If he had had before him the statement of June 8 he would have found that while the receipts up to this date this year are $632,000,000, on the same day last year they were only $609,000,000. And the gentleman would have found upon an accurate calculation that, taking into consideration the corporation taxes, which are due in this month, there will be a large surplus in the Treasury on the first day of the next fiscal year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Can the gentleman state the reason why it was possible for the gentleman from Alabama to have the statement of June 12 before him when he made his speech on June 6 or June 7? [Laughter.]

Mr. DALZELL. Why, I am afraid I can not enlighten the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. He will have the statement before him before his speech is published.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understood from the reading of the speech of the gentleman from Alabama that he stated something to this effect: That if the Secretary of the Treasury failed to place in his estimate the twenty-eight million and odd dollars that came from the corporation tax he was a fool, or words to that effect.

Mr. DALZELL. Yes; something to that effect.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And the gentleman will remember that the Secretary of the Treasury came before the Ways and Means Committee and stated that inasmuch as the constitutionality of the tax had not been determined, he had no right to estimate that as probable receipts of the Treasury?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes; and if the gentleman from Alabama had looked further down in this same column he would have found that the excess of receipts over ordinary disbursements on the 5th day of June, 1911, was $9,078,008.18, and if he had cast his eye to the next column he would have found that the receipts up to that corresponding date in the last fiscal year showed a deficit of $10,453,678.28, indicating a plain increase for this fiscal year under the rule of "Republican extravagance" of nearly $20,000,000. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. DALZELL. I do.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman was discussing the Payne bill as a revenue raiser. Will he state the amounts that were received as customs receipts on any of the days this year, or up to any day this year, in comparison with any day last year, and do they not show a great falling off in customs receipts this year from last year?

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman is mistaken. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is not discussing the revenue features of the Payne bill; he is discussing the misstatements of the gentleman from Alabama [applause on the Republican side], which were offered as an excuse for bringing into this House this humbug of a bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman does not wish to put me in a false light when he says that I am mistaken. I may be mistaken as to what the gentleman is discussing, but I am not mistaken in the fact that the Payne law has failed to produce anything like as much revenue this year as last year. The gentleman can read the figures himself, and he will find that the total receipts are made up as they are because of the extraordinary increase in the internal-revenue taxes and the miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman from New York sat beside the gentleman from Alabama when the latter gentleman made his statement. Did he indorse it? Does he indorse it now?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I may be sitting beside the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but the mere fact of my proximity to him should not be considered as an indorsement of what he said.

Mr. DALZELL. I ask the gentleman if he indorses the statement of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Which statement?

Mr. DALZELL. The statement of the gentleman from Alabama with reference to the probable Treasury receipts under this bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I confess that the gentleman from Alabama may have made an error in the reading of the statement. [Laughter on the Republican side.] But I say in justice to the gentleman from Pennsylvania as well as in justice to the gentleman from Alabama that although I have not examined with any particular care—since the gentleman's speech—the Treasury statement of June 5 or any other day, I do know that the fact which I stated is a fact, namely, that the customs receipts this year from the Payne law are considerably below the customs receipts for the same period last year.

Mr. DALZELL. I decline, Mr. Chairman, to discuss with the gentleman the revenues produced by the Payne law because I have not given the subject particular study, although I have no doubt the gentleman from New York has, and in any event he will be given ample opportunity to explain himself in this debate.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask a question for information. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. There is so much noise at this end of this room that I did not understand him accurately, but I understood the gentleman to say at the beginning of his argument that the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill was the best that had ever been passed by any Congress. Is that true?

Mr. DALZELL. That is true.

Mr. FOWLER. The best for what?

Mr. DALZELL. The best for all purposes for which a tariff bill is to be passed.

Mr. FOWLER. The best for the trusts of the country?

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, the gentleman is one of that great number who lie abed nights thinking the trusts are going to attack them. If there is no other argument available, cry "Trusts, trusts, trusts!"

Now, the gentlemen on the other side of the House told us repeatedly that they received their brief——

Mr. STANLEY. Does the gentleman mean, by his satirical answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER], to indicate that he is one of those who have no fear of those things called trusts and does not regard trusts as an evil?

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, I have great sympathy for the people who live, as does the gentleman from Kentucky, in perpetual fear of trusts.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DALZELL. I do not care to be interrupted further along that line.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. DALZELL. Gentlemen on the other side of the House contend that the election of last November gave them a brief from the people to write a tariff law in accordance with their principles. They have utterly failed——

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope——

Mr. DALZELL. I decline to yield.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I should be surprised if my colleague should make a remark requiring a reply without giving me an opportunity to reply.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman will have time in his own right.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman——

Mr. DALZELL. I do not care to be diverted from my argument by the gentleman's query.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is not in order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania declines to yield.

Mr. DALZELL. I say gentlemen on the other side of the House are continually telling us that they received a brief from the people at the last election to write a tariff law in accordance with their principles. Now, I say to them that no Democratic tariff law written by the Democratic Party since the Civil War has ever put a duty on wool. Wool was free in the Wilson bill, wool was free in the Springer bill, wool was free in the Mills bill, wool was free in the Morrison bill, and it is a matter of public notoriety, and it never has been denied, that in the Committee on Ways and Means a majority of that committee were in favor of free wool. A majority of the committee were in favor of standing by the principles of their party; but as Mr. Bryan——

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield just there for a question for information?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that a majority of the present Ways and Means Committee were in favor of free wool?

Mr. DALZELL. A majority of the majority.

Mr. GARNER. Is the gentleman complaining that a minority of the Ways and Means Committee have placed a duty on wool?

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman is endeavoring to show, and I hope successfully, that this bill is a hypocritical bill; that is, not a bill drawn in consonance with what you say was the brief given you by the people at the last election. The gentleman is endeavoring to show that the Democratic Party, being in control, has not been true to its convictions, but has, as Mr. Bryan says, yielded to its constituents, who are beneficiaries, and has abandoned its party convictions. And it is a notorious fact also, a matter of public notoriety, that no caucus action could have been had, in indorsement of this bill, had not a large number of the gentlemen upon that side of the House yielded their convictions upon the question of free wool and abandoned their party policy.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. DALZELL. I will.

Mr. FOWLER. I would be glad to have the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

Mr. DALZELL. I yield for a question, not for any expression of opinion on the part of the gentleman.

Mr. FOWLER. Is there a Democratic platform which declares for free wool written at any time in the past?

Mr. DALZELL. There is a Democratic platform that declares for free wool, and the Democratic Party in all its legislation has acted upon the policy of free wool. One of the reasons why Mr. Cleveland denounced his party was because, having put wool on the free list, they declined to put other raw materials, so called, upon the free list—iron ore, coal, and so forth.

The gentleman may indulge in technicalities, but every Democrat knows, as every Republican knows, that the policy of the Democratic Party from time immemorial, as written in a half a dozen legislative bills when they were in control, was for free wool. [Applause on the Republican side.] You virtually said so in your caucus resolution. The resolution passed in caucus to fool yourselves and subsequently put into the record to fool the people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FOWLER. I would like to ask the gentleman what Democratic platform declares for free wool.

Mr. DALZELL. I do not care to yield for a discussion of that subject. I am willing to leave the question exactly where I put it with every Member on that side of the House,

Mr. FOWLER. I supposed that the gentleman wanted to be correct in his statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. DALZELL. I have spoken of this bill with relation to the duty on wool. Let me call your attention to it as a revenue bill. The gentleman from Alabama says that the excuse or justification for this bill is that it will raise money to fill the depleting Treasury! Why, Mr. Chairman, what does the distinguished gentleman from Alabama mean?

Schedule K produces to-day a revenue of $41,000,000. Your bill provides for a reduction from that $41,000,000 of a million and a half dollars. A revenue bill forsooth to fill a depleted Republican Treasury. Already you have taken out of the Treasury by the reciprocity bill $5,000,000. You have taken out of the Treasury by your so-called free-list bill anywhere from $15,000,000 to $60,000,000, and now you propose to take out of the Treasury an additional million and a half dollars. A tariff-for-revenue bill forsooth! [Applause on the Republican side.]

But this bill is not only indefensible in the rates it proposes; it is indefensible in the methods it proposes for levying those rates. Gentlemen have argued here that one of the merits of this bill is the introduction of an ad valorem system of taxation. Why, gentlemen are driven to great stress for an argument when they claim that as a merit when in point of fact every commercial nation on the globe has long since abandoned ad valorem duties.

All the duties of England are specific; those of France and Germany and Italy and Austria are all specific duties. Every Secretary of the Treasury, from Albert Gallatin down to Daniel Manning, with the single exception of Robert J. Walker, has denounced ad valorem duties as undesirable, unjust, and impracticable of execution, and as giving room for frauds on the Federal Treasury.

In a letter addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives on February 16, 1886, Daniel Manning, Secretary of the Treasury, under President Cleveland, furnished a careful and exhaustive treatment on this subject of duties, ad valorem and specific. He quotes from a number of his distinguished predecessors, and at the end adds his own opinion. I desire to call your attention now to what is the consensus of opinion on the part of economists on this subject.

Secretary Manning begins with Secretary Gallatin, who, in 1801, said:

> Without any view to an increase of revenue, but in order to guard as far as possible against the value of goods being underrated in the invoices, it would be eligible to lay specific duties on all such articles now paying duties ad valorem as may be susceptible of that alteration.

Following the tariff of 1816, Mr. Crawford, of Georgia, who was then Secretary of the Treasury, made an elaborate report to Congress upon the question of ad valorems. The legislation of 1816 having provided for a large number of ad valorem duties, Mr. Crawford suggested that a number of them should be given a specific rate. "Mr. Crawford specifies," says Mr. Manning, "over 100 articles the list of which is printed in his report, wherein he advises the rates to be changed from ad valorem to specific."

Quoting from Mr. Levi Woodbury, Secretary of the Treasury in 1841, Mr. Manning continues:

> The records of this department, especially the circular letters and reports of my predecessor, Mr. Levi Woodbury, show, during the last years of the life of the compromise arrangement of 1833, when the average rates were approaching or had reached the limit of 20 per cent, that false invoices, undervaluations, and the nameless and the numberless devices to circumvent, baffle, and defraud the Treasury, when attempting to apply an ad valorem system, were in lively and successful operation. Much the same things were said and done about customs frauds, in and out of Congress, by manufacturers and importers, their agents and representatives, as are done and said now in 1886, so uniform are recurrent events in the life of a government as of individuals and so small in circumference are the circles of human transactions.

Mr. Manning further quotes what was said by Walter Forward, another distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, in 1840:

> With a view to guard the revenue against fraudulent undervaluations which can not be entirely prevented by the existing scheme of ad valorem duties, specific duties are proposed in nearly all cases when practicable. The operation of the system of specific duties may not be perfectly equal, in all cases, in respect to the value of the articles included under it. But this inconvenience is more than compensated by the security of the revenue against evasions, and by the tendency of specific duties to exclude worthless and inferior articles, by which purchasers or consumers are often imposed on.

I come now to quote some of the things which Mr. Manning himself said on this subject of ad valorems:

> These obvious inequalities and hardships are, I think, inherent in any ad valorem system. The experience of the Government in 1817, 69 years ago, when ad valorem rates were less by one-half, if not by two-thirds, than now, and the illuminating report of my predecessor, Mr. Crawford, whose correct judgment has been attested by the praise of Mr. Gallatin, warn us that even with the large scaling down of ad valorem rates by a horizontal reduction, or any other reduction, the inequalities and hardships of an ad valorem system and the attempting or perpetrating of fraud on the revenue are not likely to come to an end.

Another remark of Mr. Manning is the following, and how much truer it is to-day than it was even in his lifetime.

> We are living in days when profits to be derived from the carrying on of business, whether it be in buying or selling, or manufacturing merchandise, or in the railway business, or in the banking business, or in the brokerage business, or in the steamship business, come from the large volume of business done under conditions of very "thin" rates for transacting the business. Thus it happens that a comparatively small sum evaded or saved in the payment of duties to the Government will be sufficient to make the difference between a profit or loss in importation and will be sufficient to give victory in the sharp contest between rival importers and dealers.
> One advantage, and perhaps the chief advantage, of a specific over an ad valorem system is in the fact that under the former duties are levied by a positive test which can be applied by our officers while the merchandise is in the possession of the Government and according to a standard which is altogether national and domestic. That would be partially true of an ad valorem system levied upon "home value," but there are constitutional impediments in the way of such a system which appear to be insuperable.

But under an ad valorem system the facts to which the ad valorem rate is to be applied must be gathered in places many thousand miles away and under circumstances most unfavorable to the administration of justice.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield the gentleman one hour more.

Mr. DALZELL. Let me illustrate some of the practical operations of the ad valorem system of duties. Duties levied ad valorem mean, as we all know, duties levied according to value. According to value where? At the port of entry or the port of delivery; somewhere within the United States; within easy or comparatively easy reach? Not at all.

If you will turn to our customs administrative laws you will find that imported goods must be declared "at the actual cost at the time of exportation to the United States in the principal markets in the country from whence imported," in some cases. In other cases they must be declared "at the actual market value or wholesale price at the time of exportation to the United States in the principal markets from the country from whence exported."

The difference depends upon whether the goods are actually purchased or merely consigned.

In order faithfully and honestly to collect an ad valorem duty, information may have to be sought at Calcutta or Bombay, or Pekin or Yokohama, possibly at some interior town in a far-away country.

Oh, but you say the value will be ascertained from the sworn declarations, but our tariff laws are not drawn along those lines. The final ascertainment of dutiable values depends in the last analysis upon the honesty, judgment, and discretion of some customs officers. We have an army of them at our various ports of entry, appraisers and assistant appraisers, examiners, inspectors, a court of general appraisement, and finally a Customs Court. To what extent this great army of Federal employees must necessarily be added to if you adopt the ad valorem system, as is proposed by this bill, no man can tell. And then again, I suggest another difficulty. The places where valuations are to be ascertained are the principal markets of the country of exportation. We have recently debated a proposed reciprocal agreement with Canada. We found out in that debate that the difference in price, in value, of many commodities varies greatly in the eastern and western end of the long stretch of Canada that adjoins our northern border.

Winnipeg is one of the principal markets of Canada, so is Montreal, so is Quebec, and so is Vancouver. An article imported from Canada will bear one duty if it comes from Winnipeg, still another if it comes from Toronto or Montreal, still another if it comes from Vancouver, and still another if it comes from St. John, New Brunswick. I am told, for example, that hay coming from Canada varies from $2 to $4 a ton. The hay that I buy from Canada may come in at one rate of duty while the hay my neighbor buys from Canada may come in at another rate of duty.

I would like to call attention before leaving this subject to what was said by the Republican minority of the Ways and Means Committee in their report upon the Wilson bill. That report, as I recollect, was written by Mr. Thomas B. Reed. It said:

The argument against purely ad valorem duties is stronger in the case of woolen goods than in any other line of merchandise. Values in woolen goods are uncertain and fluctuating. They depend upon the values of raw material, which constantly and widely fluctuate in price. They rest upon the values of goods which are constantly changing in style, in pattern, in method of manufacture, which are affected by every passing whim of fashion, which are to-day in demand and to-morrow unsalable at any price, which are beyond the power of local appraisers, however honest, to determine and keep track of. Hence it is that the professional undervaluer has selected this particular field as one in which he can operate to the greatest advantage and with the least probability of detection and punishment. It is in evidence before the Ways and Means Committee that there are lines of woolen goods, manufactured almost wholly for the American market and sent here upon consignment, upon which no market value is placed until they have passed our customhouse and evaded some share of their legitimate duty. The specific duty has permitted the American manufacturer to continue competition, for that, at least, could not be evaded. Under the proposed law he will be driven from the field altogether in the lines referred to, for he will never know what prices he will be called upon to compete against. Where specific duties exist, the home producer always has a definite standard by which he can operate with some degree of certainty. With a law such as this now proposed his struggle will be against an antagonist in ambush who has only to change his fictitious invoices to underbid every effort of the American to hold this market.

Without dwelling further upon this subject, I close with the assertion I made at the outset, that ad valorem duties, not only because they are inherently bad, but because their inherent weakness has been discovered, have been abandoned by every commercial nation on the face of the globe.

Now, I have said all along, and I repeat, that, as a bill to raise revenue, and that is the ground on which it is sought to be justified to this House, this is a hypocritical bill. In the first place, it does not raise revenue. Under Schedule K, as it is now, the Government receives annually $41,000,000. Under this bill, if it becomes a law, the Government will not receive that $41,000,000 by the amount of a million and a half dollars——

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Is it not a fact that instead of the Government receiving $41,000,000 every year, it only received that amount one year, and that the average for the last five or six years has been about $35,000,000 from the present law?

Mr. DALZELL. Well, I have not examined that. I was speaking generally.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I will state to the gentleman the year yielding the highest revenue was the one taken for comparison in the consideration of this bill; but, as a matter of fact, the average was about $35,000,000 in this schedule.

Mr. DALZELL. I accept the gentleman's figures, but still that does not alter at all my proposition that this bill, instead of being a bill to raise revenue, is a bill to deprive us of revenue.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. If this bill will raise $40,000,000 of revenue, it will be more than the average of the Republican bills.

Mr. DALZELL. This bill raises $1,500,000 less, according to your calculation, than the amount raised last year and paid into the Public Treasury.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania says that the present bill will show a deficit of $1,500,000, I ask him if he was basing his statement upon the present law as raising $41,000,000?

Mr. DALZELL. I take that as the standpoint; yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Then, if that be true, and this bill raises $39,000,000, it will be a better revenue producer than the present law, will it not?

Mr. DALZELL. But no one knows what this bill will raise. The total revenue for the year ending June 30, 1910, according to the figures given by the print put out by the Committee on Ways and Means, is $41,904,549.50. That much revenue, according to the print put out by the Committee on Ways and Means, went into the Federal Treasury last year; and if in the years to come Schedule K should remain as it is now, it is only reasonable to suppose that that amount of money will every year go into the Federal Treasury. If this bill becomes a law, according to that same print, there will be raised $40,556,200, and, according to my way of figuring, $1,500,000, or in that neighborhood, less than is raised by the present law.

Now, then, in the first place, I say that so far as Schedule K is concerned no change is needed in order to raise revenue. It is next to the best revenue producer of all the schedules of our present tariff system; but, in the second place, as pointed out by Mr. Bryan, and as was pointed out the other day by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and as was pointed out two or three days ago by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WARBURTON], if you want to raise revenue, there are obvious means whereby you can much more readily and with less oppression to the people raise revenue than by imposing duties on wool and woolens. It was suggested by Mr. Bryan and also by the gentleman from Illinois that you might raise a large revenue by the imposition of a duty upon rubber. I might suggest other articles that are on the free list which are noncompetitive, such as tea and coffee, for instance. A duty might be put upon tea and coffee that would raise a very large revenue without changing to the extent of a single penny the price that would be paid by the consumer, as we have already learned from our experience when we had a duty on tea and a duty on coffee.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I would like to ask the gentleman if he would be in favor of putting a duty on tea and on coffee?

Mr. DALZELL. I will answer that question when the responsibility of making a tariff bill shall be put upon my shoulders.

But the hypocritical character of this bill is nowhere more apparent when you call it a bill to raise revenue than when you come to consider what it is that this Democratic measure attacks—where it goes to get its revenue. Why, with the exception of sugar and hemp, Schedule K is the best revenue producer of all the schedules of the present tariff law. Why, in raising revenue, mangle the best revenue raiser you have got? When these gentlemen went to the best revenue raiser we have got in order to raise revenue, they went to that portion of it which was least subject to amendment as a revenue measure, to wit, the duty on wool. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] conceded that the duty on wool was an ideal duty. He said it was a fairly competitive duty. It is not a protective duty to an excess. It admits fair competition of the foreign woolgrower in our market. It is an ideal duty, because it is a competitive duty and at the same time a revenue-raising duty. The revenue raised upon wool is $21,000,000, according to the last figures, while the revenue raised on woolens is only $20,000,000. So that you have taken the best revenue-producing schedule in the tariff system and mangled it for the alleged purpose of raising revenue, without raising revenue, and in that schedule you have taken the best revenue-raising paragraph and mangled it to such an extent that you deprive yourselves of $8,000,000 annually heretofore raised upon wool.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. DALZELL. I will yield.

Mr. FOWLER. Is it not a fact that America can not produce as much wool as is required for the supply of the people of America and the manufacturers?

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, I think that is true.

Mr. FOWLER. Is it not a fact that if you put a high rate of duty on wool and on the finished products it will impose on the consumer a very great burden?

Mr. DALZELL. I have not suggested the putting of a high rate of duty on wool. I have simply called attention to the fact that it is conceded by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means that the present duty on wool of 11 cents a pound is a fair duty; not an exhorbitant duty, but a fair, competitive duty; and I have called attention to the further fact, that it being a fair, competitive duty, and therefore not open to assault justifiably, it is also a fair revenue producer.

Mr. FOWLER. Is the gentleman in favor of putting the consumer in that condition, and then oppressing him by a duty such as the duties contained in the Payne-Aldrich bill and the bill preceding it?

Mr. DALZELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, not only is there no necessity for this bill for raising revenue; not only is it a fact that it will not raise revenue, but I will go a step further and say that no man can calculate accurately that it will bring a single solitary dollar into the treasury of the United States, for the reason that the estimate of probable revenue is made upon a false basis. Now, let us see how that is.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman decline to answer my question?

Mr. DALZELL. I decline to be interrupted to answer questions as to what my opinions are about a duty on wool. If I should be a member of a committee charged with the responsibility of making a tariff law I should, after consideration, announce my opinion then.

Now, how are the possible supposed revenues estimated by the Committee on Ways and Means in presenting this bill? Why, they are estimated in this way: They say, "We take the imports of the year 1896, which was the best year of the Wilson bill, when wool was free, and we compare those imports with the imports of the years 1892, 1893, and 1894, the years preceding the free wool of the Wilson bill. Then, having taken those three years in advance of 1896, the free-wool period, we go to 1898, 1899, and 1900, the years succeeding the free-wool period, and compare those imports with those of 1896."

Well, now, it requires very little argument to show that these gentlemen can have no accurate results, because they have selected abnormal years for the purpose of making comparisons. In anticipation of a tariff bill, whether it be a bill to lower duties or a bill to raise duties, imports are increased in number or decreased in number, as the case may be. Anticipating the passage of the Wilson bill, the imports of wool decreased. For instance, in 1893 the imports of wool were 175,000,000 and odd pounds; in 1894 they were 45,726,000 pounds, and in the same year, before the Wilson bill went into effect, 5,592,000 pounds.

These importations, as compared with the imports of the previous years, will be observed to be abnormally low. They were made in anticipation of the passage of a free-wool bill. They were abnormally low because people were not going to import wool and pay duties when they felt a certainty of being able to import wool and pay no duty. So that, the last importations prior to the free-wool period being 5,592,000 pounds, we find that in the year 1895, the beginning of the operation of the free-wool bill, the imports were 260,000,000 pounds, and that in the next year, 1897, they were 350,000,000 pounds. Then, coming down again, succeeding the free-wool period, the period of the Dingley bill, people had no necessity to import wool, because it had already been imported to such an extent that the market was glutted. And so you find that, succeeding the 350,000,000 pounds imported in 1897, there was imported in 1898 only 21,000,000 pounds, and in the next year 48,000,000 pounds, and in 1899, 27,000,000, and in 1900, 28,000,000 pounds. And I doubt, if you will follow the list of importations down to this present day, whether you will find that even now the imports of wool have recovered from the extraordinary importations that were made during the free-wool period.

The following table will illustrate the statement that I have made:

Quantities of all raw or unmanufactured wools imported into the United States for consumption, 1892–1900.

Tariffs.	Fiscal years.	Pounds.
McKinley—Dutiable	1892	134,632,366
Do	1893	175,035,042
Do	1894	45,726,056
Do	1895	5,592,293
Wilson—Free of duty	1895	260,134,054
Do	1896	228,647,543
Do	1897	350,250,028
Do	1898	21,577,614
Dingley—Dutiable	1898	48,757,283
Do	1899	77,388,192
Do	1900	128,250,945

To make an estimate of probable revenues by comparing the imports of 1896 with the imports of 1893, 1894, and 1895 and with the imports of 1898, 1899, and 1900, is to make a calculation upon a false basis. It is a calculation made upon an abnormal condition of things, and it is worthy of no respect whatever in endeavoring to come to a conclusion as to how much wool will be imported under the provisions of this bill if it should become a law.

Furthermore, if you increase the imports of wool 103,800,000 pounds, as this bill proposes, I can not understand any reason why that 103,800,000 pounds will not take the place of 103,800,000 pounds of the domestic production of wool. And if in addition to that you import the quantity of wool in pounds that is represented in the $40,000,000 of additional imports of fabrics, I can see no answer to the proposition that that, too, will displace just that much of the American production of wool.

I submit this proposition: It is ridiculous to base a calculation of revenue upon the assumption that you will import at the same time large quantities of wool and large quantities of woolen fabrics. The conditions favorable to the importation of either one of them is incompatible with the conditions that are favorable to the importation of the other. Let me put it this way: There will be no increase in the quantity of manufactures of wool consumed, other than might be required by the slight increase in population, which would be far more than offset by the decreased earnings and consequent decrease in purchasing ability of all those engaged in the industries of wool growing and wool manufacturing and in many collateral occupations directly dependent upon these industries. That being so, there being no increase in the quantity of manufactures of wool consumed, if the imports of the manufactures of wool are increased by $40,000,000, then American mills must produce that much less product of wool, and will therefore need less raw wool by the amount that would have been required to make in the United States the more than $40,000,000 worth of goods displaced by that increase of importations of the products of wool. Is there any answer to that proposition?

Is it not absolutely true, if the American mills make $40,000,000 less products of wool they will necessarily consume less raw wool by from 125,000,000 to 150,000,000 pounds, or in that neighborhood?

Therefore the committee's estimate that raw wool imports will be increased is fallacious. On the contrary, there will be a reduction of imports of raw wool equal to the more than 125,000,000 pounds of raw wool contained in the increased imports of products of wool upon which the committee count.

In the second place, if, on the other hand, it be assumed that the committee is correct in its estimate that raw wool imports will increase by $19,000,000, then it must be presumed that the additional raw wool imported is to be used by domestic mills to make additional quantities of woolen goods, for there is no other practical use for increased importations of wool except to be used in making goods. In such case the imports of goods must decrease by the amount which can be made out of the additional raw wool imported. In this view the committee's estimate of imports of manufactures of wool is necessarily wrong. Instead of an increase of $40,000,000 there must be a decrease by the amount that can be made from the additional $19,000,000 worth of raw wool to be imported.

In other words, it is ridiculous to assume an increase at the same time of the imports of raw wool and the imports of manufactured wool. The conditions that are favorable to the increase of either are incompatible with the increase of both. So that from that standpoint again, aside from the false basis upon which this estimate is made by the committee, it is apparent that no man can say that this bill will bring in a thousand or two thousand dollars worth of revenue, or whether or not it will fail utterly to bring in any revenue.

I hesitate very much to impose further upon the patience of the committee. I want, however, to say a word or two about protection in connection with this bill, what its influence must necessarily be upon our woolen industry.

I do not oppose at the proper time and in the proper way a revision of Schedule K. I realize that there is a large and growing sentiment that deserves recognition, in favor of revising Schedule K, but I believe that a majority of the American people while they desire to secure such revision still desire that its protective features shall be retained.

Now, then, look for a moment at the difference in the duties of the various bills with which we are familiar—the Wilson bill, the Payne bill, and this bill. I think it will be apparent at a glance, without going at great length into the subject, that this bill can not in the nature of things furnish any protection with its present rates.

The Payne bill recognizes what has heretofore been regarded as a proper method whereby both wool and the manufactures of wool shall be protected. It is a method that has been in vogue since 1867. It recognizes the right of the manufacturer of wool in competition with the foreign manufacturer to be placed on the same basis as the foreign manufacturer in regard to so-called raw material. In other words, the home manufacturer shall be allowed in addition to the rate of duty on his manufactures the amount of duty that is allowed to the producer of wool. This places the manufacturer on the same basis at the outstart as is the foreign manufacturer who buys his raw material in a free market.

I know that there are objections made to this scheme of compensatory duties, and I know also that there are objections made to the method of calculating the compensatory duty. It is denied for instance, that it takes four pounds of greasy wool to make a pound of cloth. I do not care to discuss that question. Compensatory duties and the method of their calculation have been in all the various Republican bills since 1867. They have received the indorsement of all the Republican committees and of all the distinguished men upon those committees since 1867.

Whether the rate of duty on raw wool in the existing law is too high and whether the compensatory duty is properly fixed on the theory that it takes 4 pounds of wool in the grease to make a pound of cloth may be subject to question, but clearly, if the manufacturer is to have adequate protection, he must be allowed a compensatory duty.

No compensatory duty was provided for, nor was it necessary, in the Wilson bill, because wool being free, the home manufacturer and the foreign started on the same basis with free raw material. All the duties on woolen manufactures in the Wilson bill were protective in their nature, whether actually protective or not.

It is admitted by the gentleman from Alabama that the duties on wool in the pending bill are not protective to the woolgrower.

Neither are they protective to the wool manufacturer, as I think I can show beyond question.

Take, for instance, the duty on yarns. At least 65 per cent of yarns are pure wool. Twenty per cent, the duty on raw wool, of 65 per cent, would equal 13 per cent. That measures the compensatory duty on yarns. As the duty on yarns in the pending bill is 30 per cent, it follows that the protective duty is 30 per cent less 13 per cent, or 17 per cent.

But the duty on yarns in the Wilson bill, when wool was free, was from 30 to 40 per cent. That is more than the duty in this bill.

And the duty on yarns in the Wilson bill did not furnish adequate protection.

Again, take the duty on "cloths, knit fabrics, and so forth." At least 60 per cent of these fabrics are pure wool. Twenty per cent, the duty on raw wool, of 60 per cent, would equal 12 per cent. That leaves on those fabrics for protection 28 per cent, as the duty on these fabrics in this bill is 40 per cent. But the duty on these fabrics in the Wilson bill was 40 per cent, or 12 per cent more than the duty in this bill.

And the duty on these fabrics in the Wilson bill did not furnish adequate protection.

And so I might go all along the line and show that the duties of the pending bill are less than the nonprotective duties of the Wilson bill, and that there is not sufficient protection on the manufactured articles to preserve the American industry.

But I have said enough to show the nonprotective character of this bill as to wool manufactures.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield on that proposition?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I am asking entirely for information on the subject. It is contended by some that this so-called compensatory duty being based on the value—that is, being an ad valorem duty—is entirely a different proposition than if it was specific. In other words, the value of the combed wool, for instance, has been increased by labor, and 20 per cent of the value will amount to more in money than 20 per cent of the raw wool. Does the gentleman get the idea?

Mr. DALZELL. I understand, of course, that there is a difference of opinion as to whether or not in the first place this compensatory duty ought to be levied in the manner in which it is, and there is also a difference of opinion as to the method of ascertaining what the compensatory duty is. There is a great diversity of opinion on that subject, and, as I said, I do not care to go into that subject, because I do not think it is material to what I am now discussing. I have simply endeavored to show that a comparison of the duties in the Payne bill and in the Wilson bill and in this bill show upon their face that they have no value whatever as protective duties, and that the probabilities are that with the passage of this bill and its becoming a law there will be a destruction of the woolen industry in this country. So far as the duty on wool is concerned, it amounts to nothing. It does not make much difference what the duty is on wool unless it is protective. As the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means stated, the present duty is a fair competitive duty, and that is 40 per cent. Any duty below that would cease to be competitive and protective.

It is plain from a comparison of these rates of duty, as I have given them just now, that if our industries could not live under the Wilson bill they can not live under this bill. I do not propose now to discuss at length the effect of the Wilson bill upon our woolen industry. It is a matter of history. All men know that the woolen mills were idle, and that their employees were wandering the streets hungry and wageless. I can recall myself what happened in my own State, in the city of Philadelphia, where great armies of the unemployed wandered in its streets because the textile mills were closed against them and against everybody else.

Now let me call attention in that connection to some significant figures. In 1893, prior to the Wilson bill, there were in this country 47,274,000 sheep, and their value was $125,909,000. In 1897, during the period of the Wilson bill, there were only 36,819,000 sheep, and the value had fallen from $125,000,000 to $67,021,000. In 1910 the number had increased under the influence of the protective policy to represent a value of $233,664,000. These figures need no comment. They speak for themselves. I place beside the free-wool period the preceding protective period and the succeeding protective period and show that as to our sheep industry one period means adversity and the other means prosperity.

To go a step further: In 1893 the imports of wool were 55,152,285 pounds, and in 1896, during the free-wool period, they were 350,852,026 pounds. The difference between 55,000,000 pounds and 350,000,000 pounds means the measure of adversity to the American woolgrower. The prices between 1893 and 1897 show a steady, continuous decline. The prices of Ohio fleece wool from 1893 to 1897 were as follows: 1893, 29 cents; 1894, 23 cents; 1895, 17½ cents; 1896, 19 cents; 1897, 19 cents.

Not only did the Wilson bill flood our markets with imports of wool, but it flooded them with imports of manufactures of wool also. In the manufactures of wool in 1893 there was an import of 35,565,879 pounds, while in 1896 the imports were 53,494,400 pounds. The difference in the imports as between these two years shows the difference between adversity to the American wool manufacturer in the free-wool period and prosperity in the period of protection under a Republican law. I do not care to pursue this subject further, considering the length of time that I have already occupied.

I have not considered the effect of insufficient duties on wool upon the question of our food supply. It is plain, however, that whatever tends toward the diminution or destruction of our flocks tends toward the reduction of our food supply and to the increase of the cost of living. I read now from the following:

Table showing how the domestic flesh-food supply (mutton) and the wool supply have been increased or decreased as the wool duties of the tariff have been above or below 11 cents per pound on wool of the first class.

[2] The Dingley Act of 1897 reenacted in the Payne Act of 1909, covering a period of 13 years.

It is a serious matter to interfere with an industry of such importance to our people as is the woolen industry. Almost every State in the Union is interested in it. There are in the neighborhood of a thousand mills, and the capital invested exceeds $400,000,000. More than a hundred and sixty thousand employees are dependent on it for their livelihood, and wages received by them aggregate annually over $79,000,000.

The four hundred millions of capital represents a very large number of stockholders, great and small, many of them women and representatives of estates.

Interests so important in amount and extent and so varied should be dealt with only with the greatest deliberation and not in the hasty, unintelligent, and haphazard way proposed in the pending bill.

When we come to consider the cost of producing woolen goods here as compared with the cost of producing them abroad it will be very apparent, I think, from what I have already said, that the duties of the pending bill are not sufficient to enable our manufacturers to compete with the foreign manufacturers.

Upon that subject I desire to call the attention of the committee to some testimony. Mr. W. A. Graham Clark, a textile expert of the Bureau of Manufactures, appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means of the last Congress, some two years or more ago, and I quote from his testimony:

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1908.

Mr. CLARK, having been first duly sworn by the chairman, testified as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. You are employed in the Bureau of Manufactures?

Mr. CLARK. I am a special agent in the Department of Commerce and Labor, Bureau of Manufactures.

The CHAIRMAN. What is your full name?

Mr. CLARK. W. A. Graham Clark. I am one of the six men who are employed by our department to investigate commercial conditions in foreign countries, and my line of work is textiles. I have just returned from a 28-months' trip, having been investigating the markets for cotton manufactures in Asia and the methods of cotton manufacturers in Europe, and for the last two months I have been working specially on getting information from the English wool mills in regard to their cost of manufacture for the use of this committee, and it was thought that it might be best for me to come before the committee and give you gentlemen a résumé of what I found, and you can question me on any special point that you desire.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If you can do so conveniently, will you just state the names of the schedules that you are talking about as you come to them, so that we can follow you?

Mr. CLARK. I am not a tariff expert, and I am not speaking on the tariff at all. All I am here for is simply to speak about the English wool industry and the cost of English wool manufacture. Three hundred and forty-eight to 383 is the wool schedule. But I am not here as a tariff expert, as I have said, but simply as a textile specialist and to give you the results of what I found abroad. I understand that the main thing that will be desired of me will be to say what is the difference between the English systems and the American systems; what advantage they have over our manufacturers.

Their advantages in brief are cheaper first cost, cheaper money, cheaper wool, cheaper labor, cheaper power, cheaper supplies.

Our machinery and costs of building are higher than in England by at least a fourth. Then in obtaining money to start the mill they pay 4½ per cent where we pay 6 per cent. Our very big manufacturers can possibly get money at 4 per cent; theirs similarly at not over 3 per cent, possibly less.

* * * * * * *

In regard to wages, from information gathered in Italy, France, England, and the United States I have figured up the comparison in the following table.

	Italy.	France.	England.	United States.
Sorters	$4.60	$6.40	$7.30	$12.50
Washers or dyers	3.00	4.25	5.00	7.00
Carders	2.30	4.00	3.90	6.00
Gill boxes	2.30	3.70	3.00	6.00
Comb minders	2.30	3.70	3.00	6.00
Boss spinner	7.00	9.25	12.00	18.00
Mule spinner	5.80	6.20	7.30	9.50
Ring spinner	2.30	4.00	3.00	6.00
Weavers	3.00	4.60	4.00	9.00
Fullers and pressers	3.50	4.25	6.00	7.00

If we assume the wages in the United States at 100, this would give the English wages at about 50; the French, say, 45, and Italian 33⅓, but this can only be general; for instance, in some cases the French operative gets more than the English. In general, however, their wages are less. The English wool operative is paid less than the English cotton operative, which is due to various causes, principally to the fact that there is a larger proportion of women in the wool mills, and these mills are more scattered, so that there is little organization of workers, and the industry is so complex and changeable that even if organized it would be difficult to secure any uniform scale of wages. Cotton manufacturing is a standardized industry, but wool is not, and it is not only divided into the totally different branches of worsteds, woolens, and shoddy, but is much more subject to the vagaries of fashion.

Their cost of power is less than ours. Theirs is about two-thirds of a cent horsepower an hour, while ours is about 1 cent a horsepower an hour. They figure on £3 10s. (say $17) a horsepower a year, while our average cost will be about $30 a horsepower a year. They get coal at about 9 shillings ($2.19) a ton, where we would pay nearer $3.50. Our higher cost of coal is mainly due to our mills being more scattered and farther from the mines, but our first cost of steam plant is also higher.

Another advantage mentioned was cost of supplies. Besides ordinary supplies, wool mills use large quantities of dyes and chemicals, which have to be imported. Belting and general supplies are also higher in the United States than abroad.

These are the main differences and show that in general everything that enters into the cost of manufacture of woolen and worsted goods is cheaper in England than in America.

Another party who appeared before the Ways and Means Committee by letter was Mr. Thomas H. Ball, of Philadelphia. I will read his letter:

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Hon. SERENO E. PAYNE,
Chairman Ways and Means Committee.

DEAR SIR: As argument against any lower revision of Schedule K of the Dingley tariff bill as regards worsted yarns, the writer represents 30,000 to 40,000 worsted spindles here and has recently investigated and received from England the wages paid for the same work there for comparison.

Comb minders receive in England $4.30 to $4.75 per week, as against $6.50 to $8.50 in our mills here; drawers receive $2.80 to $3 in England, as against $6.50 to $7 here. Boys, $2.12 to $2.24 in England, as against $4 to 5 here. Girls in spinning rooms receive $2.24 to $2.75 in England, as against $5 to $7 here.

In regard to the French system of spinning, the writer represents Jules Desurmont & Sons, Tourcing, France, who have recently established a branch at Woonsocket, R. I., and the figures below are the wages paid by this concern in Woonsocket and in their mill in France.

Wages paid here for spinners $16 per week; in France $6.50 per week. Piecers paid here $12 per week, in France $4.50. Drawing hands $6.50 here, in France $3.25. Twisting, spooling, and reeling $6.50 here, and $3.25 in France.

Being interested in some mills in Belgium, are in a position to state with full knowledge that the wages in Belgium on this line of work is on an average of 5 per cent cheaper than in France, and in Germany on this same line of work the wages rule from 10 to 20 per cent lower than in France.

The English firm of Joseph Benn & Son have a mill at Greystone, R. I., in addition to their works in England, both establishments employing similar classes of labor and producing the same fabrics. They state in Greystone, R. I., they pay their help over 100 per cent more than in England, the average wage in England being $4.77 and at Greystone $10.26.

They have published a comparative tabulation of wages paid in their respective plants in England and the United States covering 18 classes of help. This shows the weekly average pay of $4.77 in their English factory and $10.26 in their United States plants, or 115 per cent higher wages in the latter than in the former country.

Benn & Son say their employees can save more in this country than they can earn in England.

Testimony to the effect that the duties of the pending bill are not adequate to enable our manufacturers to live in competition with manufacturers abroad might be multiplied indefinitely, but I refrain from further citation.

There is one other question to which I desire to call attention before concluding and that is this: The wool and the woolen industry is a matter of commanding importance in its relation to our national independence. A country might just as well be without an army or a navy as without a wool industry. It is necessary in time of peace for the health of our people, and absolutely necessary to our success in time of war. To be without a wool industry at whatever cost is to be dependent for our most material equipment upon foreign nations—a dependence the thought of which is not to be tolerated for a moment. Our Revenue Commission, which was appointed in 1865 to consider our general revenue system, gave prominence to this idea when they said, amongst other things:

> The home production of wool is necessary to render us properly independent of foreign policies, in peace and in war, in obtaining our supplies of an article on which the lives and health of all our people depend. It is necessary to national economy, for no great agricultural country can afford to import its most important and costly raw material. * * * And finally, it is necessary to extend and complete the circle of diversified industries on which the wealth and independence of nations so much depend.

The question, therefore, of the life of the industry rises high above the mere question of its cost.

Mr. Herbert Whitney Wright has recently written a book, entitled "Woolgrowing and the Tariff," which has been published as one of the volumes in the series of Harvard Economic Studies, in which he reviews in a most impartial and philosophic manner the history of the inception and growth of the wool and woolen industries of this country. Treating the tariff question from a nonpolitical viewpoint, he is inclined to believe that it has not had the influence upon the industry that is generally attributed to it. As bearing upon this question of our national independence, I beg leave to quote what he says:

> From the conclusion that the power of the tariff to affect the loss of the woolgrowing industry has in the past proved very slight it does not necessarily follow that such power as it has should not be exercised. Whether the maintenance of the industry in this country is worth the cost involved is a question upon which we do not here attempt to pass judgment. The advisability of the adoption of free trade or protection involves broad problems of economic principles and public policies such as would carry us rather beyond the subject in hand. But assuming that the policy to be followed is determined, that it is deemed best to maintain the woolgrowing industry and to protect it against foreign competition, let us see what light a study of the history of the industry throws upon the method to be adopted and the line of action to be followed in order to secure the end desired.
> To reach this end two things are essential. First, there must be a thorough understanding of all the forces which exert an influence on the industry; secondly, there must be sufficient power in the duties to counterbalance the rivalry, of whatever sort, which all the other forces may develop. This being the case, a bare outline of the situation that would confront us may be suggested.
> As the newer lands of the world are opened to development and transportation facilities are improved, the territorial division of labor will become more nearly world-wide, especially among industries largely dependent upon natural resources. In the United States the situation is such as to render any marked advance in the woolgrowing industry impossible and a gradual decline likely. Experience indicates that the power to prevent this is not to be found in the present tariff. If the industry is to be maintained in a position of the same relative importance as formerly a higher tariff will be necessary. A tariff which simply offsets such advantages as the foreign woolgrower may have in relatively cheaper cost of production is not sufficient. The foreign fleece is by no means the only rival of the American; equally serious competitors are found at home, in the greater relative profits of other lines of agriculture. The very advantages and great natural resources of the country have thus become an obstacle. Therefore, if the lands of the woolgrower prove to be particularly well adapted for something else, and it is still deemed best that his sheep be not abandoned, he must have a duty such as would make wool at least as profitable as that other product for which his land is so well adapted. The greater the superiority of the land—the better fitted it becomes for other things—the heavier must be the duty. To some this may appear to make the cost of protection high, but as the history of the old woolgrowing centers shows, it is a cost which the adoption of this policy involves. It does not necessarily condemn the policy; it is simply one of the things to be weighed in the balance against such advantages as the maintenance of the industry may secure to the country.

If, therefore, from the standpoint of the relation of the wool industry to our independence as a nation, it is essential that the industry should be maintained at whatever cost, it is apparent that wisdom dictates the choice of such policy as will produce that result. All experience has shown that that policy is the policy of protection, the historic policy of the Republican Party, whereby in agriculture, in commerce, and in manufactures we have become the leading Nation in the world's progressive march toward a higher civilization. [Loud applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Alabama desire to use some time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like for the gentleman from New York to consume some time at present, so as to make up the difference in time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, when this discussion commenced it was not my intention to consume any of the time of the committee with remarks upon this measure, but as I have listened to the assaults that have been made from time to time on that side of the Chamber upon the sheep industry that has played so prominent a part in the development of the great State which I have the honor in part to represent, as I have noticed the obvious intent of the majority of this House to pursue practically the same course relative to that industry that it pursued the last time it was in control in this Congress, I have felt that I would not be performing the duty that I owe to the people that live in the eighth Ohio district unless I should say something upon this Democratic wool measure.

This discussion has had some advantage, and one of the most important things, to my mind, is the fact that it has to some extent cleared the atmosphere. We are beginning to find out where gentlemen on that side of the House stand. We are beginning to discover what the real Democratic policy is with reference to the sheep industry and the wool industry. It may seem strange that there should be any query about that, but those of us who have campaigned in Ohio know that there is a good deal of doubt in some quarters as to what the attitude of the Democratic Party is, and as to what the attitude of Democratic candidates for Congress is, upon this question of free raw wool—or a revenue tariff on wool, if you please.

And I say that this discussion, if it has accomplished nothing else, has at least brought out this fact, brought it out before the report reached the House, in fact, that in the estimation of the Democratic caucus this bill should be preceded by an apology. The caucus is the ruling power in this House, because everybody knows that it does not make any difference what amendments will be proposed on this side of the Chamber, it does not make any difference what arguments are proposed, it does not make any difference how fair the proposition may be, in the last analysis this measure is to be railroaded through without amendment.

Members on that side of the Chamber are not free to vote as their best judgment might dictate. And this ruling body in the lawmaking department of the Government, namely, the Democratic caucus, felt that this measure was so out of harmony with what they had promised the people, that it fell so far short of what they had expected to do that it was necessary and fitting and proper to introduce this bill into this House by means of an apology, or, as some one has said here this morning, a sort of a disinfectant, as it were; because we are told in the famous resolution that was presented by the gentleman from Texas, in substance, that this bill was not to be taken as a true representation of Democratic policy and Democratic principles, but that something else was to come in.

It is not sufficient to say to the farmers and woolgrowers of Ohio, Michigan, and Indiana, and all the other great wool-producing States, that their industry is to be paralyzed; that they are to be compelled to sell their flocks at greatly reduced prices; that the industry is to be put upon such a footing that it can scarcely live. But coupled with that is the proposition that surely must be very comforting to the woolgrower—he is told by the Democratic caucus to cheer up and look pleasant, because the worst is yet to come. In other words, it is not sufficient that this bill shall be passed, but it is coupled with the threat that is borne out by the argument of distinguished gentlemen on that side of the Chamber, that the ultimatum is to be, not simply a revenue tariff on wool, but it is to be free wool, as was pointed out by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], who has just spoken.

The leader of the Democratic Party, the most prominent living Democrat, is now criticizing you most bitterly because you have not done the thing which you mean to say by the Kitchin resolution you ultimately will do. In other words, you have made up your minds to destroy the wool industry. It has been said a number of times by distinguished and able gentlemen on that side of the aisle that in the framing of this bill no view was to be had and no view was had of the influence it would have upon any American industry.

If I mistake not the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS], in response to queries from my colleague [Mr. LONGWORTH] and from the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON], stated that it would have made no difference at all if it had been known that this rate of duty or that rate of duty would have absolutely wiped out the industry—that it would have made no difference.

The colloquy referred to was as follows:

Mr. LONGWORTH. It has been the intention of your committee, has it not, to depreciate the price of raw wool?

Mr. PETERS. It has not been the intention of the committee to depreciate; rather, it has been the intention of the committee to enable the manufacturer to obtain the imported wool cheaper, so that the tax on the finished product may be made less.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, but the gentleman I do not think answered my question. Of course, if this bill is as the gentleman says, solely in the interest of the consumer, it must be the intention of the committee to depreciate the price of raw wool and of manufactured wool. Now, my question relates solely to the price of raw wool, and I ask the gentleman if it is not the intention of the committee to depreciate the price of raw wool.

Mr. PETERS. It is expected the price of raw wool will be lower, if this bill passes, than if the present duty of 11 cents a pound should remain on it.

* * * * * * *

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield for another inquiry?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman's party, in the framing of this bill, is proposing to levy a tariff on the tariff-for-revenue-only basis, as I understand. Has the gentleman considered whether under his theory, not mine, he could reduce the duty still lower on raw wool, thereby more nearly approximating the view of his great party leader, Mr. Bryan, and at the same time increase importations and increase revenue? Has he considered whether that could be done?

Mr. PETERS. Yes; and I may say to the gentleman that we would have had free wool, and the duties on woolen goods would have been made lower, had it not been for the necessity of raising sufficient revenue to pay for the extravagances which have been imposed on the Government by the gentleman's own party, in which, as he is in a very prominent position in that party, he may consider himself entitled to a great deal of responsibility. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. However, the Treasury statement seems to indicate that we are increasing our revenue and that there is no real reason, even from your standpoint, on which to base this measure.

Mr. PETERS. Does not the gentleman know that there is a bond sale pending?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. On the gentleman's theory, could he not still further increase his revenue by reducing the duty on raw wool?

Mr. PETERS. No.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. And also more closely approximate the views of his great leader, Mr. Bryan?

Mr. PETERS. I wish to say that putting the bill on the basis of raw wool——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Could he not reduce the duty still further, even on his own theory, and still raise more revenue?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly not. If that could have been done, we would have done it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That is, even to the point of free raw wool?

Mr. PETERS. Most certainly.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That would be the gentleman's idea?

Mr. PETERS. That would be my idea, that I would have as little a burden as possible placed on the consumer.

* * * * * * *

Mr. LONGWORTH. In the report, on page 11, submitted by the majority of the Ways and Means Committee, stress is laid upon the fact that the cost of producing sheep in Ohio is larger than in other districts in the country.

Now, I will ask the gentleman this question: If he knew that a 20 per cent duty, as provided in this bill, was less than the difference in the cost of production of wool in Ohio and abroad, and therefore necessarily under the 20 per cent rate it will be impossible to raise sheep profitably in Ohio, would he, nevertheless, vote for the 20 per cent rate?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly not. I do not believe the people of this country who consume the woolen goods should be taxed in order to make an industry profitable where it would not naturally exist, and I——

Mr. LONGWORTH. I do not think the gentleman answered my question exactly as he intended. He said, "Certainly not"—that is to say that he would not vote for the 20 per cent duty. Perhaps the gentleman misunderstood my question, which was this: That if he knew the 20 per cent duty was not sufficiently high to equalize the difference in the cost of production of wool in Ohio and abroad, would he, nevertheless, vote for the 20 per cent duty?

Mr. PETERS. The cost of production of sheep would have nothing to do in determining what I should vote for as a duty on raw wool.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The cost of production would be no element whatever in the gentleman's mind?

Mr. PETERS. No; none. I did not at first understand the gentleman. I would answer "Certainly" instead of "Certainly not" to his previous question.

RAW WOOL.

It is stated and repeated and reiterated that in the framing of tariff measures the Democratic Party does not consider any industry. It is to write its tariff laws blindfolded, without regard to the effect they will have upon the great industries of the Republic. And so we are face to face, then, with that condition; if this debate has done nothing else, it is at any rate fortunate that it has made it possible for the people of this country at last to understand what it is proposed to do.

You propose to pass this bill now, and then, if through any mysterious mischance it should become a law, if you should ever get the power, you propose to follow it up with another bill that will put the farmers' product, the woolgrowers' product, upon the free list, and thus complete the destruction of this great industry. And I for one am tremendously grateful to the men on that side who have had the courage to say in debate exactly what they think.

We have had to fight this enemy in the dark in Ohio for 20 years. It has been said in many quarters of the State that the Democratic Party was in favor of a protective tariff on wool. I have heard distinguished Democratic orators say that, and up to this time there has been some doubt about the proposition. But from this time forth there can not be any doubt. We know where you stand. We know what proposition you make, and the people of the country, in my judgment, will act accordingly.

It seems to me that there is not any call for this legislation now, except the political exigencies of gentlemen on that side. I am protesting against the passage of this bill in the name of the farmers and woolgrowers of Ohio, and I propose to discuss the bill from their standpoint. Those farmers and those woolgrowers have been among the most potent influences that have operated in this Republic in the past few years in the creation of a sentiment for a permanent tariff commission or a permanent Tariff Board. I happen to know something about the position taken by that great organization, the Grange, upon this question, and I know that those men, those real farmers—not those pseudofarmers who farm the farmers, but the real farmers of Ohio, the Grangers, the sheep men, the woolgrowers, have used their influence continuously in favor of the creation of a Tariff Commission, a Tariff Board. They, with the great majority of the American people, believe that that is the way to get the information upon which tariff legislation ought to be based. They have done what they could to bring about that situation in which there would be a sufficiently vigorous public opinion to sustain Congress in the passage of a bill that would provide for a permanent Tariff Board or Tariff Commission.

Well, as members of the committee well know, Congress acted. The Tariff Board was created. The Tariff Board is at work. The appropriation is made. And, as we have learned in the discussion to-day, it was stipulated that the report of the Tariff Commission should be made not later than December of this year. Everybody recognizes, whether he be Democrat or Republican, that the tariff legislation that we have had heretofore has been in a sense unscientific, so far as the collection of the facts was concerned. We have never had a permanent tariff bureau for the purpose of obtaining these facts. Well, finally, we got one. That Tariff Board is now at work. It will be ready to report in December. And yet the majority party now brings in this legislation, in the face of these facts, in the face of the fact that there is not a gentleman on that side—and I am frank to say not upon this side and there is not a member of this committee—that can tell at this moment the difference between the cost of production of a pound of wool in Ohio and in Tasmania, the difference in the cost of production of a pound of wool in Michigan and in Queensland. You can not do it. You have not the information.

But here we have in the Tariff Board a body of experts, a body of scientific men, that are at work, at great expense, collecting the information upon which we might make a scientific tariff, for the first time in the history of the Republic. And yet, in the face of these facts, the majority proceed upon the theory—I suppose upon the theory; I am not in their confidence—they proceed upon the theory that it is not necessary to have facts in order to revise the tariff from the Democratic standpoint. In fact, it seems to me that their leaders are perfectly consistent in having this change of heart as to the wisdom of creating a Tariff Board. We had supposed that this Tariff Board was a nonpartisan proposition. Everybody was a unit upon that. But gentlemen say that they have lost confidence in this Tariff Board, and I am bound to say that I think they are consistent in their opposition to the Tariff Board, because if tariffs are to be levied without reference to the effect that they have upon any American industry—and that is laid down here as a theory; it is said that in the levying of a tariff the only thing that we should have reference to is the amount of revenue that will be produced; we should pay no attention at all to the effect that that tariff will have upon any American industry—if that is to be the theory, I can understand why gentlemen on that side should reject the idea of a Tariff Board.

In other words, if you are going to legislate blindly and without regard to the facts, why, possession of the facts may be an embarrassment. What need does a Democrat have for facts to legislate upon the tariff question? Bless you, he legislates upon the basis of theory, not upon the basis of fact.

Consequently, if this new theory is to be carried out according to their standpoint they do not need any Tariff Board.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I understand my friend to say that no Member upon this side or upon that side knows anything about the difference in the cost of production of a pound of wool at home and abroad. Is that true?

Mr. WILLIS. I did not state it in quite that way, but then that is approximately true. What I said I will repeat: That there is no gentleman on this side or on that side—not even my good friend from Florida, for whom I have such profound respect for his ability and all that—who knows the exact difference in the cost of production of a pound of wool in Ohio and Tasmania. Do you?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Now, my friend says that the Democrats are proceeding to revise this schedule without that knowledge. He says that we are proceeding blindly. I want to ask him how the Payne Ways and Means Committee proceeded two years ago, when they did not have the knowledge which he says we have not got now?

Mr. WILLIS. I will say to the gentleman from Florida that I decline absolutely to go into any discussion of a matter of that kind that I do not know something about. I tried mightily to be here to aid in the passage of the tariff legislation of that session, but there were circumstances beyond my control which it would be embarrassing to me to discuss that prevented my coming, and consequently I am not in a position to give any detailed information about how the Payne law was made. [Laughter.]

But to come back to the proposition that I was just making, that if we are to have a tariff levied without any reference at all to the influence it will have upon any American industry, then I can understand why there need be no collection of facts. But the position that the farmers and sheep men of Ohio take is this: They say, "Here we have stood honestly and earnestly by this idea of a Tariff Commission. In public meetings and by public resolutions we have done all we could to formulate public sentiment."

The Tariff Commission has finally been provided for, the Tariff Board is at work, and we say to you, "Wait until you have the facts. Do not proceed in ignorance of the facts. Do not proceed upon the theory that you are to ignore actual existing conditions, but wait until the regular session of Congress."

That is the proposition that is made by the farmers and woolgrowers of Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman speaks of the farmers and woolgrowers of Ohio. He has a very thorough knowledge of the growing of wool in Ohio, a practical knowledge, I understand. Will he state whether in Ohio there are very large flocks of sheep owned by a few men of wealth, or whether the flocks are small as a rule, and distributed about the State, and whether the industry is a diversified one or not?

Mr. WILLIS. I shall answer that question, propounded by my colleague, to the best of my ability, and I want to say to him that the sheep industry of the State of Ohio is not in such a condition as it is perhaps in some of the States of the Union. It is not in the hands of a few people. There are not simply a few great flocks and a few great flockmasters.

The sheep industry of Ohio is diversified; that is, I mean to say it is scattered out over the State. I could not pretend to give anything like a fair statement of the average size of Ohio flocks, but they are comparatively small. Here will be a farmer who owns 50 sheep and his neighbor will have 100 and another 75, and so on. Of course, once in a while, you will find a farmer who specializes, and will have several hundred sheep, but those cases are rare. Therefore I speak of this earnestly, because I want you to see the effect that this bill which you are proposing to pass will have upon this industry. It is not something that will simply strike a few people. But if you pass this bill, you depreciate the value of wool and the value of sheep. It is a matter of record that that is what you propose to do. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] made that clear the other day in a question that he put to the gentleman from Massachusetts and got a categorical reply that wool was to be decreased in price in the markets of the country. That is the declared object of this legislation.

Let me call your attention to the fact that the effect of this legislation is not going to strike alone on one or two flock masters, but it is something that will permeate the whole State. Do not get in your minds the idea that the great millionaire sheep owner of the West is the only one to be affected, but understand that when you pass this bill you strike down the wool industry of my State, and you are striking at the means of sustenance and livelihood of the small farmer, the man who owns 50 or 60 acres of land. Those make up the great majority of flock masters of Ohio.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIS. I will.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the gentleman regard the prices of woolen products as being in harmony with the prices of other products of necessity?

Mr. WILLIS. I would rather not take that question up just now. I am talking about the effect of this legislation on the wool industry of my State. I am not going into the manufacturer's schedule.

Mr. FOWLER. The real question I desire to ask is, Are not the farmers of Ohio, as of the Nation at large, willing to reduce the price of their product when they can get a corresponding reduction in the price of the finished product?

Mr. WILLIS. That sounds fair. I heard speeches like that along back in 1892. I heard arguments like that, and it was said that if we would overthrow the robber barons, whoever and wherever they are, prices would be lower and it would be easier for the people to live. I heard it said, because I was living and moving around in this country along in those years; it was said by distinguished Democratic orators that the result of the free-wool provision of the Wilson bill would be that clothing would be so much cheaper and the necessaries of life would be so much cheaper that it would be much easier for the farmer to buy clothing for himself and his family, and that he could afford to bear the reduction in the selling price of his wool and sheep.

Unfortunately for the farmer, that specious argument found lodgment in the minds of a good many of the American people. So the Democratic Party was put in power, and it afterwards gave us the Wilson bill. What was the result? You had a reduction in the price of the wool and sheep all right, and perhaps you had some reduction in the price of clothing, but you did just what you are going to do now. You so paralyzed the industries of this country by your continuous assault, by your breaking down of the policy of protection to American industries, that the farmers of this country did not have anything to buy even cheap clothing with. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FOWLER. But the gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. WILLIS. I have answered it in my own way. Perhaps it is not satisfactory to the gentleman.

Mr. FOWLER. I am asking for information.

Mr. WILLIS. Well, if the gentleman will listen, he will get it. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOWLER. I will put the question again. Are the farmers in your State willing for a reduction on the price of wool?

Mr. WILLIS. No, sir.

Mr. FOWLER. If a corresponding reduction is made on the finished product?

Mr. WILLIS. I have answered that question once, but I will answer it again. The farmers of Ohio are not willing to take the chances of an industrial paralysis that will come from Democratic tariff tinkering. They are not willing to take the chances of getting their clothing cheaper as an offset to the disadvantage that will come to them for having the price of wool lowered, particularly in view of the previous policy your party has carried out when business was so paralyzed in the country that the farmers did not have anything with which to buy even the cheaper goods.

Mr. FOWLER. Then the gentleman is in favor of a tariff of 150 per cent. Is it not a fact that if you place a high tariff on wool you must also place a higher tariff on the finished product?

Mr. WILLIS. There should be a tariff on the finished product if there is a tariff on wool, but not a tariff of 150 per cent.

Mr. FOWLER. Is it not a fact that you must place a higher tariff on the finished product?

Mr. WILLIS. I presume that would be true. Then what?

Mr. FOWLER. That is true, then?

Mr. WILLIS. That would be true, because I believe in protecting the American labor; yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Then, do you regard the tariff that is on wool now as a proper tariff for the wool of this country?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes; I regard the tariff on wool as a proper tariff.

Mr. FOWLER. Do you regard the tariff on the finished product——

Mr. WILLIS. I say to the gentleman that I am not discussing that. If the gentleman wants to make a speech about that he may do so.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask one more question.

Mr. WILLIS. I decline to yield unless the gentleman wants to ask a question on the subject that I am talking about. I am not talking about the manufactured schedule. I am talking about the protection on wool in Ohio and the other wool-producing States.

Mr. FOWLER. You have said——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman if he asks a question on the subject that I am talking about.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to ask a question for information.

Mr. WILLIS. Do it.

Mr. FOWLER. You have said that the tariff requires a correspondingly higher tariff on the finished product. Now, I desire to ask you: If the present tariff on wool is a proper tariff, as you have said, is not the present tariff on the finished product a proper tariff?

Mr. WILLIS. Oh, that does not follow. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FOWLER. Well——

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can not ask a question and then answer it also. The fact that I am saying to this committee that a tariff of 11 cents a pound is a proper tariff upon raw wool of Class I, or that 12 cents a pound might be a proper tariff on second-class wool, is one thing, but there is a tremendous hiatus between that proposition and the proposition that therefore every rate that may be provided in the Payne law upon every manufactured article is proper. There is no logic in that. I am not discussing the schedule on manufactured woolens, and I am not going into that. The gentleman may if he wants to.

I am talking about the effect of this bill upon the sheepmen and the woolmen and the wool industry of this country, and I do not wonder that the gentleman wants to get away from the proposition because I tell him that there is a rod in pickle for the men who propose to break down the sheep industry in this country by passing this bill.

Mr. FOWLER. Is the gentleman in favor of a reduction in the woolen schedules as they now exist?

Mr. WILLIS. I am not in favor of a reduction of the woolen schedule as long as that reduction is gotten up over on that side in any such unscientific and destructive manner as this bill is drawn. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I think I have made my position clear on that. I want now to take up another phase of this subject. I say to the members of this committee that this bill that is brought in here is put upon a false basis. I shall not say very much upon one point I had expected to discuss, because it has been so thoroughly covered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] in his remarks. As I go over this report of the Committee on Ways and Means—and I have read it as carefully as I can—there are two general reasons given for the bringing in of this bill for the necessity of its enactment into law.

Mr. GOEKE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. GOEKE. Does the gentleman think that the people of the eighth district of Ohio, and the people of Ohio generally, are satisfied with Schedule K as it now exists?

Mr. WILLIS. I will say to my colleague that I think they are a great deal better satisfied with it than they would be with this bill that my friend is proposing to vote for—vastly better.

Mr. GOEKE. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield.

Mr. GOEKE. Then my colleague suggests that they are not particularly satisfied with it as it now exists, does he not?

Mr. WILLIS. I will say to the gentleman that I am not at all embarrassed about it, or mealy-mouthed about it. There are some items in Schedule K of the present law that are not satisfactory to the people generally, nor to me, as I suppose there are some that are not satisfactory to him. It is not likely that there ever will be a tariff law that will be entirely satisfactory to everybody.

And if the gentleman or I had had the writing of that schedule perhaps some things in it would have been different; but since my friend has asked me a question about that, let me ask him a question. The majority has announced through the leaders upon that side that this is only the first step—that ultimately there is to be free raw wool. I would ask my friend if he is in favor of free raw wool?

Mr. GOEKE. Whenever there is a general revision of the tariff so that we can provide for the revenues by placing wool on the free list, I would be in favor of putting wool on the free list. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIS. That answer is perfectly frank—as the answers from my friend from the fourth district are always frank. But that puts the question a good ways off, I think, with the qualification that he has put into it. Now, I want to proceed with the line of reasoning I had in mind. There are two reasons that are given for the bringing in of this legislation. The first one is that it is a financial necessity to make some sort of an explanation to the American people, who, without regard to party, have been asking for a tariff commission or a tariff board and have been petitioning that the revision of Schedule K shall await the finding of that board as to the facts. In order to make some explanation to the American people as to why you have deserted them upon that proposition you now propose to legislate without any investigation of the facts, on the theory that such legislation is a financial necessity. That is the first excuse that is given.

The excuse that there is a financial necessity was filled as full of holes as a sieve by the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]. I am not in the confidence of the Committee on Ways and Means, but it has never been asserted that any financial officers of the Government have appeared before the committee and asked for any financial legislation. In view of the facts as they are shown here by this official statement of the United States Treasury for to-day, in view of the fact that we have in the Treasury of the United States a working balance of $25,000,000; in view of the further fact that we have a total balance in the general fund of $86,000,000; in view of the further fact that this day the excess or ordinary receipts over ordinary disbursements is $148,000; in view of the further fact that it appears on page 3 of this statement that for this year thus far the excess of receipts over disbursements is $15,000,000, and in view of the unquestioned and unquestionable facts, as presented here a few minutes ago by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], that argument as to financial necessity absolutely falls to the ground. There is no financial necessity for this legislation. The Treasury is in a safe condition, and this claim that the Treasury is depleted is trumped up here simply as a sort of flimsy excuse for this attack upon the great woolgrowing industry of this country. [Applause on the Republican side.] Then, the second argument that is given, or the second so-called argument, or second excuse is this. It is claimed—and I imagine a majority of the committee shed a great many tears as they wrote these lines you will find in the report, pages 24, 25, and 26—it is claimed that the wool industry is a dying industry. Sad, doleful facts are here presented.

The number of sheep and the amount of the clip have not been increased in proportion to the population—

I am reading from page 25, and then at the bottom of the page—

The fact must be faced, therefore, that the 40 years of high protection have entirely failed to really help the wool-growing industry as a whole. This long, troublesome, and costly experiment has not yielded the results claimed by its advocates. The test of long experience, by which every human project must stand or fall, proves that the protective duties on wool do not serve a useful purpose. The protection theory involved, if indeed it was ever sincerely believed by its promoters and principal advocates, has broken down. The excessive burdens forced upon the consumers under the present high duties have driven them to use other textile fabrics in place of woolen goods to a very great extent. It is characteristic of policies in restraint of trade that they are driven to extremes by the beneficiaries they make powerful and injure the fair opportunities of all.

See! They say it has been a long, troublesome, and costly experiment, and the logical conclusion is that since it has been a long, costly, and profitless experiment that therefore they propose to abandon it. Stripped of all verbiage, the statement on page 26 of this report, if it means anything at all, means that the gentlemen in control of that side have come to the conclusion that the sheep industry and the wool-growing industry of this country are not worth while, and they are not going to try to preserve the life of these industries. They go on further on this page:

The principal part of our woolgrowing is now in the far Western or Mountain States, which in 1910 produced about 50 per cent of the total domestic clip. For a number of years the raising of sheep for wool has been a comparatively small incident of agriculture in the older and Eastern States. It is evident that the development of agriculture in the West is bringing into more profitable use a great deal of land heretofore used only for pasturage, and with the steady increase in our population pasturage must give way more and more to agriculture throughout continental United States. The raising of large numbers of sheep requires great ranges of suitable grazing land, with suitable water and soil conditions. It is therefore evident that in the future, with our rapidly increasing population, if our people are to continue to use wool for clothing to a great extent, a larger percentage of the domestic consumption must be imported than has been the case heretofore. This will not mean a less demand for our domestic wools, but a greater and better demand for all the domestic wool that can be raised, if unwise restrictions discouraging the use of wool are avoided. It is maintained by a very large number of our best economists and statesmen that the economic situation involved in our rapid progress as a nation requires that our ports should be thrown open to the importation of wool free of duty; and this view, based on the most profound consideration of the public welfare, has found expression in Democratic legislation. It is the constant intent of the Democratic Party to make the burden of tariff taxes as light as possible for the people, and to levy tariff taxes on a revenue basis as promptly as possible, for the party recognizes no justification whatever for tariff taxes except the necessity of revenue.

And so on. I will insert that in my remarks in the RECORD. I will not take the time to read it now.

Down at the close of that paragraph the committee say:

This will not mean a less demand for our domestic wool.

It is a fact that it is proposed in this bill to bring in something like 200,000,000 pounds a year in addition to what is now being imported, and it is claimed that that is not going to decrease the demand for American wool. How in the name of common sense could such a proposition as that stand for a moment? As was shown here the other day by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], our Republican leader, how is it possible that you can bring in something like 200,000,000 pounds per year and yet not displace any American wool? The mere statement of that proposition disproves it. But let us read on. It sounds like the siren's song that the people listened to back in the election of 1892. It says:

This will not mean a less demand for our domestic wools, but a greater and better demand for all the domestic wools that can be raised.

How well I remember a speech by a distinguished Democratic statesman, in which he said that if we simply had free wool we would increase the market for American wool; that we could use it in mixing, and all that sort of thing. I will ask the men who are old enough to remember to simply look at the facts as they know them. Did that work out? Was that argument valid? Did it increase the market for American wool or the price to the farmer under the operation of the law of 1894? Was the argument good then? If it was not good then and did not work out, what makes you think it is of any account and will work out now?

But let us go on. They say, and here is the milk in the coconut:

It is maintained by a very large number of our best economists and statesmen that the economic situation involved in our rapid progress as a nation requires that our ports should be thrown open to the importation of wool free of duty; and this view, based on the most profound consideration of the public welfare, has found expression in Democratic legislation. It is the constant intent of the Democratic Party to make the burden of tariff taxes as light as possible for the people, and to levy tariff taxes on a revenue basis as promptly as possible, for the party recognizes no justification whatever for tariff taxes, except the necessity of revenue.

Recurring, again, to the proposition to which I referred at the beginning of my remarks; that is the proposition of the Democratic Party now. That party disregards the welfare of every American industry and levies its tariffs for revenue only. There was a time when they said, "We are in favor of a tariff for revenue only, with incidental protection." And I am not saying but what there may be a very small degree of protection in this bill. Personally I think there is. Your great leader, Mr. Bryan, thinks there is a good deal of protection in it. But I want to say in passing that there is not enough to amount to anything. You will hurt the wool industry just about as badly by the passage of this bill as it was hurt in 1894 by the passage of the Wilson law. You are hurting it now by the threat of passing this bill to be followed by a bill putting wool on the free list just about as badly as you would if you had brought in your bill for what you actually believe. Why did you not stand for the thing that your party absolutely stands for and which it promises for the future, namely, free wool? Why do you qualify? You are following the theory, I suppose, that if you cut off the dog's tail an inch at a time he will feel more comfortable about it.

It is, then, the Democratic proposition that the wool industry is a dying industry; that you might just as well let it go. Now, I want to canvass that situation very briefly and see whether this wool industry is a dying industry. I call attention to the fact that whenever you have had tariff legislation like unto this, the wool industry has temporarily been a dying industry. I refer to a table which I have before me.

Effect upon the number of sheep of 5 experiments during the past 43 years with revision of the wool tariff.

[Whenever the duties have been below 11 cents per pound on wool of the first class, flocks have always decreased, and, on the other hand, when the duties have been as at present (11 cents per pound or higher) they have always increased.]

Year of enactment.	Term of existence.	Rate of duty per pound.	Per cent of increase (+) or decrease (−).
		Cents.
1867	Last 4 years of it	12½	+25
1883	About 6 years	10	−16
1890	Less than 4 years	11	+10
1894	do	Free.	−21
1897	12 years	11	+46

Under the act of 1867 the tariff on wool was 12½ cents per pound. In the last four years of that tariff the number of sheep in this country increased 25 per cent. Then under the act of 1883 the tariff was reduced to 10 cents. Note the effect it had. I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that experience has shown that as soon as you go below the rate of 11 cents per pound duty on first-class wool you paralyze and practically destroy the woolgrowing industry of this country. Under the act of 1883, as I have said, the duty was reduced to 10 cents a pound. What was the result? In six years there was a reduction in the number of sheep in this country of 16 per cent. The very minute that you get below that danger line of 11 cents per pound duty, then you work destruction to the woolgrowing and sheepraising interests of this country; and for that reason, as I said a little bit ago, this feeble palliative you have introduced here does not do the woolgrower any good. If, as experience has unquestionably shown, it requires a duty of 11 cents a pound to make the industry live, then, if you put it down, as you are proposing now, to a duty of 20 per cent, you might just as well put it to 5 per cent, because you will kill the industry, anyhow. That was the effect then of this law, with a duty of 10 cents per pound, in six years. There was a decrease in the number of sheep of 16 per cent.

Then came the act of 1890—the McKinley law. In less than four years, under the operation of that beneficent statute, with first-class wool bearing a duty of 11 cents a pound, you had an increase in the number of sheep in this country of 10 per cent.

And then came the halcyon days for Democratic wool legislation. As I have alluded to it before, the people listened to the argument, or the statement, rather, that if wool was put on the free list there would be an increased demand for the American product and the farmer would not suffer any reduction in his prices. Well, see how it worked. Under the Wilson law of 1894 you had free wool. What was the result? What was the result, I say? The result was that in three years you had a falling off in the industry is this country of 21 per cent. To bring that to my own State, just so that you can see the effect, I hold in my hand Ohio's statistics for 1897. Do not be alarmed, gentlemen; I do not mean to read this through or any considerable part of it, but I mean just to place before you some facts to bear out this proposition.

Take, for example, the county of Champaign, not one of the greatest sheep counties in the State. The wool clip in that county in 1890 was 121,000 pounds. Under the beneficent influences of the McKinley law the clip rose in 1893 to 175,000 pounds. Under the baneful effects of the Wilson law it fell to 104,000 pounds.

Here is another—Delaware County. Here you have, under influence of the McKinley law, 400,000 pounds; under the Wilson law, 210,000 pounds. And so on with the other counties in the district that I have the honor to represent—Hancock and Hardin and Logan and Union.

In Hancock County in 1890, 213,000 pounds of wool were shorn; under the McKinley law this increased in 1892 to 231,000 pounds; but under the destructive influence of the Wilson law the clip fell off in 1896 to 155,000 pounds. Hardin County's wool clip in 1890 was 199,000 pounds; in 1894 it had increased to 210,000 pounds under the McKinley law; but in that year the Wilson law came like a blight on the wool industry, and production fell off in 1896 to 154,000 pounds. Farmers sold their wool at meager prices and drove their sheep to the slaughter pens or gave them away. Logan County's wool clip was 220,000 pounds in 1890; under the encouragement of the McKinley law it increased to 299,000 pounds in 1893, and then fell off under the Wilson law to 155,000 pounds in 1896. Under the McKinley law in 1891 Union County sent to the market 338,000 pounds; under the baneful influence of a Democratic free-wool law the clip fell to 190,000 in 1896. And in all these great counties not only was the annual production of wool greatly reduced, but the small amount that was produced was sold at ridiculously low prices, and sheep could hardly be disposed of at any price. These facts are emphasized by the figures of 1897, when the disastrous effects of Democratic free-wool legislation under the Wilson law became fully apparent. The farmers and woolgrowers have been struggling slowly upward to recoup the losses sustained between 1894 and 1897, and they want no more legislation such as almost drove them to bankruptcy in those years. They are carefully improving their flocks and trying to restore the sheep industry, and they are succeeding. In view of the present prices for their product, they ask that the present tariff of 11 cents a pound on raw wool be retained.

The same story is told in every county. In the years that the people were struggling under the act of 1894 the number of sheep fell off; prices went down; there was stagnation in the wool industry. You could not sell wool at any price. Absolutely you could hardly give sheep away, and that situation obtained in other places in the country. There is no question about that. It was a situation that was well-nigh universal. There was no market for sheep, no market for wool.

Absolutely every time you go back to the principle of a protective tariff of at least 11 cents a pound upon wool, then your wool industry has revived, and so it has operated in this case. Under the Dingley law of 1897, in 12 years, with wool bearing a duty of 11 cents a pound, there has been an increase in the number of sheep in this country of 46 per cent. Gentlemen will say, "Why, the wool and sheep industry in the world is dying; it has decreased." I call attention to another table, which I shall insert in my remarks, showing that at the very time that the number of sheep of Europe has decreased 10 per cent—while in North America, as a whole, the number has decreased 7 per cent, while in South America it has decreased 9 per cent, while in Asia it has decreased 18 per cent, and so on with the different continents—at the same time that there has been a decrease in the sheep industry and the wool industry in other countries, in this country, where the industry is protected under the principles of Republican tariff laws that give to the woolgrowers a protection of at least 11 cents a pound—under the provisions of these beneficent laws, I say, the wool industry and the sheep industry have grown and prospered and increased. When at the very time that there has been a decrease in these other continents and in these other countries, in the United States of America in 12 years, as I have pointed out, there has been an increase of 46 per cent, and the same thing applies to the State of Ohio. There has been a tremendous increase there.

I have a letter here that I received this morning from the Census Bureau, in response to a question of mine that I had sent to the department, calling attention to the fact that in the State of Ohio, where our Democratic friends tell us the sheep industry and the wool industry are of so little importance that they can be trifled away—that it is a dying industry, as they say, in the State of Ohio—there has been an increase in the number of sheep in that State of something over 10 per cent in the past 10 years.

I will print as part of my remarks the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR, BUREAU OF THE CENSUS,
Washington, June 12, 1911.

Hon. FRANK B. WILLIS,
House of Representatives, Washington.

MY DEAR MR. WILLIS: In compliance with a telephonic message through the chief clerk, I hand you herewith an exhibit of the number of sheep and the fleeces of wool returned by the census for the State of Ohio at various census years. This has been prepared by the chief statistician for agriculture, Dr. L. G. Powers:

Years.	Sheep.	Fleeces.
	Number.
1850	3,942,929	.....
1860	3,546,767	.....
1870	4,928,635	.....
1880	4,902,486	4,902,486
1890	4,060,729	3,683,823
1900	2,648,250	2,897,604
1910	2,892,272	.....

No distinct tabulation was given of the fleeces of wool in 1880, and the census reported as the number of fleeces a number equal to the number of animals returned as sheep. In 1890 a separate tabulation of sheep and fleeces of wool was made. Those numbers differ. The explanation of the difference is doubtless that the instructions for 1890, as well as for preceding years, did not tell the enumerators whether they should include lambs or not. The number of lambs included in 1890 is undoubtedly substantially equal to the difference between the number of fleeces and the number of sheep as given above. The number of sheep reported in 1880 was no doubt exaggerated to the same extent and due to the same cause as in 1890. In 1900 the census asked specifically for a separation of the number of wool-producing sheep and lambs, and at that time the number of fleeces of wool shorn was somewhat greater than the number of wool-bearing sheep on hand at the date of enumeration. The difference represents the fleeces of sheep that had been slaughtered between the time of shearing and the date of enumeration. Any complete enumeration of sheep and wool in the spring of the year will show a slightly greater number of fleeces shorn than of sheep on hand. The enumeration of wool in 1909 as returned by the census of 1910 is more or less imperfect, owing to the date of enumeration; hence the figures for wool in Ohio in 1909 are not fully expressive of the facts. The number of fleeces shorn was doubtless a trifle more than the number of wool-bearing sheep reported, as stated above.

Very respectfully,
ROLAND P. FALKNER,
Acting Director.

And, by the way, this is another reason why I am opposed to the passage of any bill upon this subject at this time. We are trying to get information. You can not get information from the Tariff Board, because its report is not yet ready. And this is the extent of the information that I have been able to get from the Census Bureau as to the wool situation in Ohio; and I speak these words not by way of criticism of the Census Bureau, because they gave me all the facts they had. But that information is not now obtainable. It will be in a few months from now. Why rush in such headlong haste to destroy this great American industry? Why not wait and get the facts from the Census Bureau and the Tariff Board? These facts will be obtainable in a few months. If your proposal to abandon the woolgrowers to destruction is just, you should not fear bringing the facts to light, or do you suspect that the facts are against your contention and is this the cause of your unseemly haste to blight and destroy the woolgrowing and sheep-raising industry?

The conclusion I want to make from all this is simply that the wool industry is not a dying industry. It is an industry that has fallen off tremendously in periods when we have had Democratic tariff legislation, and it has revived when we have had protective legislation.

Another thing I want to call your attention to in that connection is that there seems to be a misunderstanding in some quarters as to the number of sheep in this country. I heard gentlemen discussing the matter the other day, and it was said that there are only 38,000,000 or 39,000,000 sheep in the country. I have here the statistical abstract issued by the Government of the United States. At page 148 you will find that in 1906 the number of sheep was 50,000,000; in 1907, 53,000,000; in 1908, 54,000,000; in 1909, 56,000,000; in 1910, 57,000,000; a constant increase.

So that the second proposition upon which this legislation is based, namely, that the sheep and wool industry is not prospering, that it is not of sufficient importance to warrant any consideration or attention at the hands of this committee—that proposition is without any foundation whatever.

I want at this point to call your attention to what seems to me to be a very remarkable doctrine. It appears in the report sent out by the committee. It appears also in the discussion that was had upon the floor of the House by distinguished Members of the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means; consequently there can not be any mistaking the authority of these statements.

That doctrine, which to me seems astonishing, is set forth in the report of the committee, and also brought out particularly in the remarks that were made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS], in which he complains bitterly that as a result of Republican legislation certain importations have been cut off. It was said, for example, that here are such and such importations of woolen manufactures, and that without this Republican policy of protection the importations would have been greater. It was said by way of complaint and indictment and criticism that in certain lines there were practically no importations, and the argument running through that all the time was that it was a matter of alarm and should be a matter of dissatisfaction—a matter that ought to be remedied by legislation, if we had got to that point where American industries would come anywhere near supplying American needs. The statement referred to follows:

COMBED WOOL AND TOPS.

Tops constitute the second process in the manufacture of cloth. One of the few changes in the act of 1909 is the insertion of a special paragraph on the duty on tops. Prior to this enactment tops were not separately reported. It is to be expected that the ad valorem rate on tops would be low, as they are one of the raw materials entering into manufacture. The present, however, is practically a prohibitive one, and last year there were imported only $1,129.80 worth, which resulted in an equivalent ad valorem rate of 105.19 per cent. This is reduced to 25 per cent. The imports of tops have been so insignificant and the present duty is so largely prohibitive that it has been very difficult to obtain a point for a revenue rate. Even under the present rate, however, it is estimated that the present importation will not be extensive.

YARN.

The present act provides a compound and ad valorem duty for yarns, of which in the last year there were imported $326,886.02 worth, which resulted, under the tariff, in an equivalent ad valorem rate of 82.38 per cent. This duty is practically prohibitive. This is especially so of the duties on cheaper yarns. While the act of 1901 made a slight change in the rates, it amounted to nothing, as the imports were still absolutely insignificant. The imports for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1910, consisted of only 127 pounds, worth $28, on which was paid a duty amounting to 159.75 per cent ad valorem. As with the yarns used in the cheaper form of cloths, their prohibitive duties added greatly to the expense of the finished product. As practically all the yarns imported were over 30 cents per pound, the specific duty became a constantly diminishing burden as the class of yarns grew more expensive.

Mr. Chairman, that objection develops the whole difference between the theory of Members on that side of the House and of Members on this side of the House. The Republican theory, as I understand it, is that it is better if we can develop our own industries, if we can employ our own labor, if we can build our own mills, if we can raise our own products, that that should be done in this country than that it should be done in a foreign country. To me it is perfectly amazing that gentlemen should criticize or complain because American inventive genius, American skill, encouraged by an American protective tariff, and American workingmen, and American capitalists, have been able so to develop the industry in this country that we are foremost in it and are able to supply our own demands. It seems to me that instead of being a matter for criticism it ought to be a matter for congratulation.

But, I say, the mere discussion of that proposition develops the difference between the theory of gentlemen on that side and gentlemen on this side. There was one particular phase of the discussion that was little short of astonishing. I read from the RECORD, at page 1869:

Shoddy, waste, and rags have placed on them the same duty as that on wool—20 per cent. Many of these articles are the raw materials for certain mills, and their lowering in price from an ad valorem rate under the Payne bill of 38.96 per cent to 20 per cent should greatly lessen the tax on the consumer. The present duties on importations of shoddy are practically prohibitive. In this last year only 30 pounds were imported which bore an ad valorem duty, a return to the Government of the magnificent revenue of $7.50.

On the entire importations under this schedule, amounting in 1910 to $203,509.25, duties were paid of $79,293, at an ad valorem rate of 38.96 per cent. Under the proposed act it is estimated that the importations will reach $890,500, which, at the rate of 20 per cent, will produce a revenue of $178,100.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. I yield to the gentleman 20 minutes additional.

Mr. WILLIS. I simply want to develop that point, Mr. Chairman. In the report of the committee the same thought is brought out at page 29. Near the top of the page it says:

The bill H. R. 11019 provides in one paragraph (2) for all the wool wastes, shoddies, mungo, flocks, wool extract, carbonized wool, carbonized noils, and rags composed wholly or in part of wool, and on all these articles, including wool wastes and woolen rags not specially provided for, imposes a uniform duty of 20 per cent ad valorem, the same as on unmanufactured wools. It has been the Democratic policy to treat the principal wool wastes in the same way as raw wools are treated in tariff legislation. Such was the case in the Wilson bill in 1894 as it was passed by the House of Representatives, in the Springer bill of 1892, and in the Mills bill of 1888. In the Wilson Act of 1894 the Senate imposed a duty of 15 per cent on shoddy, noils, wool extract, yarn waste, thread waste, and other wastes, although leaving raw wools free of duty; but in the Springer bill of 1892 and the Mills bill of 1888 these articles were treated exactly like raw wools. As to woolen rags, mungo, and flocks, the Wilson Act of 1894 made the rate 15 per cent, while the rate proposed in the Springer bill of 1892 was 25 per cent. The Mills bill of 1888 treated these articles exactly like raw wools.

Now, at the bottom of the same page:

The existing duties on the wastes, shoddies, and rags are provided for in paragraphs 372, 373, and 374 of the act of 1909. These duties are improperly and unfairly proportioned. On the actual imports of the fiscal year 1910 the ad valorem equivalents of the duties collected ranged from 32.06 per cent on noils to 38.08 per cent on rags and flocks, 57.97 per cent on yarn, thread, and other wastes and wool extract, and 375 per cent on shoddy. The average ad valorem equivalent of the duties collected on all the articles of the group was 38.96 per cent.

Now, if you will turn to page 92 of the report you will find a detailed statement under the subhead "Shoddy" that ought to be very interesting. This is under the acts of 1897 and 1909. For example, here in the year 1901 there were only 7 pounds of shoddy imported; 1907 there were 55 pounds imported; 1908, 50 pounds; in 1910, 30 pounds. Now, if gentlemen will look to the right in the table they will find that the rate of duty in one year was 250 per cent, another year 174 per cent, another year 98 per cent, and in 1910, 375 per cent.

In other words, under the present tariff law under Republican legislation, we say the American people are entitled to woolen clothing. We are opposed to the system that allows rags and mungo to come in free of duty. As you will see on page 93, when the Wilson tariff law was in operation, rags were made free. There was a sense of poetic justice and propriety in that. Under that act that sent thousands of people into the street, that broke up great industries in this country, that destroyed the farmer's market, that ruined the prices for crops, that brought such depression to every industry as the country has not seen for half a century, it was a fitting thing that the law that brought all these enormities on the people should provide that rags, the Democratic clothing for the people, should be put upon the free list. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

And so you go on, and when you come to Republican legislation, the acts of 1897 and 1909, the higher duties provided a percentage of 59 per cent on rags, and mungo 190 per cent. Another rate of 121 per cent, practically none of it imported.

Now, the Democratic Party, acting through its caucus, proposes to pass a law whereby rags, for illustration, shall be imported at a much reduced rate, and they complain because the people are not allowed to have these luxuries under Republican legislation.

Mr. KONOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KONOP. Are not rags on the free list under the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill?

Mr. WILLIS. I think not. No.

Mr. LONGWORTH. They are dutiable at 10 cents a pound.

Mr. WILLIS. My colleague says they are dutiable at 10 cents.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Wisconsin undoubtedly has in his mind cotton rags used for paper making.

Mr. WILLIS. Yes; and that has no bearing on this question. Now, if gentlemen will look at page 93 of the report they will find that on mungo, one kind of rags, the rate of duty amounts to 190 per cent in one year; in 1903 to 121 per cent, a very high rate of duty, and that has been the Republican policy all the time. The rates on shoddy, rags, and mungo have been high, sometimes prohibitive.

The Democratic policy is that instead of encouraging American industry, instead of encouraging the American farmer, the woolgrower, you put rags on the free list in order that the people may have cheap clothing. I say that there ought to be a duty of 5,000 per cent on such things, a duty that would be absolutely prohibitive, and yet gentlemen on that side complain because the duty is so high.

Now I want to read from the hearings on the Payne bill, page 5325. I have heard gentlemen here complain because the people did not have the privilege of buying rags that are scraped out of the filthy alleys and gutters of continental Europe, filled with disease and dirt.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. I believe the gentleman stated a moment ago that he was in favor of the American people wearing woolen clothes. How does the gentleman expect them to wear woolen clothes when you put a tax of $10.20 on every $10 worth of woolen clothes they have to buy?

Mr. WILLIS. I would like to say to the gentleman that that can not be, with a duty of only 11 cents a pound on raw wool.

Mr. HOWARD. As a matter of fact, if the gentleman will allow me to pursue the question further, is it not true that we have to wear rags, practically, under your system of taxation?

Mr. WILLIS. It is under a Democratic administration.

Mr. HOWARD. Is it not under Republican administration?

Mr. WILLIS. Oh, no. Under the tariff regulation the duties are made so high now that they are practically prohibitive, as is said here by the committee in its report; but the committee wants to make them cheap, so that the people can have the privilege of buying clothes made out of rags.

At page 5325 of the hearings I find the following:

As an illustration of the reason for this, you are referred to epidemics of cholera raging in Europe during the life of the Wilson Act. Men and women died by the thousands and were buried in trenches close to the surface, like in cases of burials on the battle field. Much of such clothing never escapes the cupidity of the rag picker, and this danger will justify any duty that excludes rags, on the ground of preserving the health of the American people, even if the duty were 1,000 per cent. Another reason for making the duty prohibitive is that each pound of foregin shoddy, rags, or waste displaces at least three pounds of American unwashed wool.

So, I say to the gentleman, that while it is the Republican policy that the American people should wear good woolen clothing, we want that clothing made out of wool, and not out of a lot of rags and waste and shoddy, such as is provided for in this bill that is introduced here. That is the difference between the gentleman's theory and practice and ours.

Mr. Chairman, I have occupied much more time upon this subject than I expected to occupy, and I want to say simply this in conclusion, that it seems to me that a great industry like this—an industry that is not segregated in some remote quarter, but an industry that is part and parcel of the life of the great mass of the American farmers—should have adequate protection. In my own State the wool industry is not carried on by a few great flockmasters, but it is the small farmer with the small flock of sheep that makes up in the aggregate the great showing that our splendid State makes in woolgrowing. Here you have an industry of 57,000,000 sheep in the United States and nearly 4,000,000 in Ohio, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has said so much better than I can say it, and it must be realized that that industry is not only a valuable one in time of peace, but also in time of war.

It is valuable in time of peace because it furnishes employment to American labor and food for American consumers, and because it is one of the most economic branches of industry that is carried on in connection with agriculture. It is of supreme value in time of war. I believe this country ought so far as possible to be independent. We want to be able to provide the clothing of our soldiers, we want to be able to care for our soldiers and sailors and marines, and I say to you that if you had maintained until now the rates of duty that were established in the McKinley law you would be producing in the year 1912 more than 600,000,000 pounds of wool, and that is more than our annual consumption.

It seems to me, then, that a great industry like this, that not only clothes the people but feeds the people, ought to be protected. Are gentlemen aware that in a single year there are 16,000,000 sheep consumed for food purposes? That is a line of industry that has developed in comparatively recent years. Is it not true, then, that an industry which furnishes employment to the best people on this earth—the farmers of the country, the men who live on the farm far removed from the turmoil and the struggle of the great city, caring for their flocks and herds—should be adequately protected?

Is it not true that an industry so intimately connected with the lives of these people, an industry upon which they depend, many of them, for almost all of the ready cash they have in the course of the year, an industry that so touches every phase of our national life, that is profitable in time of peace and a means of defense in time of war, an industry which in its manufacture employs $500,000,000 of capital and 160,000 people—is it not a fact that such an industry as this ought to receive some consideration from Members on that side when they propose to make up their tariff legislation?

But such is not the case. It receives no consideration at their hands. Here are the two propositions: Members on that side say, "When we go to make a tariff we shall make it without any reference to the effect it shall have upon any American industry. We shall make it without reference to whether it shall throttle and destroy this industry or that one; we shall make it simply from the standpoint of revenue, with ultimate free trade in view." In other words, Members on that side stand committed by their statements and resolutions to the ultimate proposition of free raw wool. On this side we stand for the idea of protection to the American home owner, the American woolgrower, the American farmer, the American laborer. The lines are well drawn, the division is clear. To the American people we can only say, "Choose ye!" [Loud applause.]

[Part of S. Doc. No. 440, 61st Cong., 2d sess.]

If the wool clip of the United States had continued to increase at the rate at which it was increasing during the last four years of the tariff law of 1867, when the duties were 12½ cents per pound, by the year 1895 the United States would have produced a quantity of wool sufficient for its entire requirements.

But then, as now, there was a cry for tariff revision downward. It was declared that the many consumers were being taxed for the benefit of a few woolgrowers, and that the latter were growing too rich and could easily stand a shave of 2½ cents a pound without injury.

As a result wool duties were reduced to 10 cents per pound in 1883. Under this duty the labor cost of producing wool was from 25 to 30 per cent lower than it is to-day; but even with this advantage the 10 cents per pound duty failed to maintain the number of sheep, and before the law was repealed there had been a decrease of 16 per cent in the number. If that law had not been repealed, at the same rate of decrease the United States would be practically without sheep by 1950.

SHEEP BEGAN TO INCREASE.

The great mistake of reducing the wool duties was then discovered, and Gen. Harrison was elected on the issue of adequate protection for wool, and with this in view the McKinley Act was enacted with a duty of 11 cents per pound. The number of sheep began to increase immediately and continued to increase until the McKinley Act was repealed by the free-wool Wilson Act of 1894.

Even during the short life of the McKinley Act, with adequate wool protection, the number of sheep increased 10 per cent; and if it had not been disturbed, at the rate of increase then in progress, by 1915 this Nation would be producing 650,000,000 pounds of wool annually, which is more than it has ever consumed in a single year.

Then came the cry for free raw material again, and on this issue Grover Cleveland, with a Democratic Congress, was elected, and the duties on wool were removed.

During less than four years of this terribly destructive free-wool experiment the number of sheep decreased 21 per cent.

[1] From figures of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers.
[2] From the Yearbook of the Department of Agriculture.

Very few persons realize how few sheep there are and how little wool there is in the world in proportion to the population. If the world's total supply of 577,000,000 sheep were all eaten there would be only three-eighths of a sheep for each person; and if its annual wool production, 2,600,000,000 pounds, was evenly distributed the allotment would be only 1.7 pounds for each person.

As the people of the United States consume annually over 6 pounds of wool per capita the importance of maintaining the domestic supply is apparent.

The proportion of domestic wool produced, when reduced to scoured, is 46¼ per cent of the total supply, and the proportion of imported wool is 53¾ per cent. This will be apparent by an examination of the following table:

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 hour and 30 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH].

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Chairman, it seems that the discussion about the high prices of commodities all centers around the tariff problem. In my opinion, the tariff forms one of the least incidents in the high cost of living. The politicians use the tariff issue as a decoy to deceive and make believe that if the tariffs were revised as they pretend they should be that living would be cheap.

For political power the tariff has been worked to its utmost. The subject is one of importance, but for years it has obscured more vital problems. Of course, the tariff should have a proper amount of attention, but it is not tariff legislation that will remedy the main difficulties that we are contending with.

Politicians have kept the tariff in our minds to the exclusion of more important problems, and while our attention has been riveted to the tariff there have been established in our social relations false systems that have placed us in a state of dependence that now presents the most complicated problems for us to solve.

We can not regard the tariff problem from the same point of view that we would if our financial system was on a proper basis, and under the present existing conditions I believe in a tariff that takes into account our industrial conditions measured with those existent in other countries. A tariff should be levied on those commodities that are equally natural of production with labor here; that would measure the difference in the compensation paid for labor in producing here and the compensation paid for labor in producing in competing countries. I do not know what that difference is—in fact, no one can except in a general way—and it must be apparent to any person that the tariff requires to be changed with the constantly changing conditions.

I call attention to a few things that affect the cost of living other than the tariff.

A few years since the money changers, who are now in control of the industrial and speculative trusts, discovered that there was great profit to them in working this generation in order to produce for remote future generations. They are using the present collective energy of the people and the natural products of this generation for the use of many generations to follow, whereas a few years back we produced for ourselves and our children only.

Formerly we were satisfied to take care of our immediate needs, which included giving to our children the necessary health, education, etc., in order to fit them for life, and it was assumed that they should take care of their own; consequently more of our energy was used for our immediate needs, which naturally made it easier for us to live.

We are tearing down much of the work our fathers did for us, and we are now building for the people that will be here after we and our children are gone. Go down town, if you will, and see the valuable buildings that were built only a few years ago that are now being torn down to be replaced by new structures that will stand for hundreds of years.

In New York City the same work is done on a larger scale. In to-day's paper I read that Madison Square Garden is to be destroyed and that the great structure there is to be replaced by a new one that will cost many millions.

Go into any large city, and it will be found that what our fathers and we have built does not satisfy present desires, so we are expending our energy in tearing down our past work and rebuilding new for future use. Some of us may get some benefit from these, but there is no way we can avoid paying for their entire production. Whatever energy this generation spends it pays for. That is an economic fact, and we would do well to consider some economic facts here instead of playing politics.

On June 16, 1910, I made a statement (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 8270, 61st Cong., 2d sess.) in which I discussed at some length the cause of high prices. I think that any person who will take that statement, read it, and then follow the investigations on his own account will believe that the immense production of property now for future use has had far more to do with increasing prices than the tariff has had. Consider just a few of the many:

The railway systems have been enormously extended. In 1850 there were 8,571 miles of railway in the United States; in 1909 there were 236,838 miles. The passenger traffic has increased approximately 300 per cent in 20 years and the freight over 300 per cent. Many billions of dollars were expended in building railways in that time, a large part of it suited to last as long as the earth stands. Tunnels alone within New York City, built within the last few years and which will last as long as the earth keeps its shape, have cost about $500,000,000, and an order has been made for $257,400,000 more. Old buildings torn down and new ones to take their place, which will last hundreds of years, have lately been and others are being built in this country, costing in the billions of dollars; the increased cost of armies and navies is another great item; canals, the Panama alone to cost $500,000,000, have been and are in the process of construction; bridges alone in one city cost about $100,000,000; two railway terminals in the same city, one just completed and the other in process of construction, approximately cost $150,000,000; and so on, I could add to the recent, present, and prospective constructions that have been and are taking place, all of which is to aid in one way and encumber in another the unborn generations at the expense of the present.

Take one item as an illustration and consider it from its different angles:

The Pennsylvania terminal in New York City cost approximately $100,000,000, and was opened November 26, 1910. The New York Times, at the time, in an editorial commenting on it, said:

> In a sense it is proper to speak of the Pennsylvania's terminal as a gift to the city. It would be very difficult to show that the road would receive a direct return for its expenditure—that is, that the fares paid for new passengers attracted to its lines by this terminal will suffice to pay interest on its cost.

The editorial did not consider that, when the Pennsylvania Railway system undertakes to bolster its freight charges, it figures in the $100,000,000 terminal as a part of the cost of its system on which the Supreme Court holds it has a right to base its charges, and that in fixing them it has a right to a reasonable rate, and that no legislative body can confiscate its property by reducing the rates below a reasonable earning on its capital investment.

The Times editorial, further commenting, says:

> The Pennsylvania Railroad is a great corporation, and is not exempted from the widespread feeling of hostility to corporations which has been engendered in this country by the talk and writing of countless demogogues and agitators. The Pennsylvania terminal, admirably serving the needs and promoting the convenience of the public, a magnificent structure which is an adornment to the city, is this corporation's reply to the flow of reckless and irresponsible abuse of corporations.

Here, again, the editor failed to comprehend the fitness of things. The Times, so far as I know, may or may not be a corporation paper. It discusses problems generally with a full sense of appreciation in the interest of the general public, but it errs in its consideration of the Pennsylvania terminal, for without this new magnificent $100,000,000 terminal the company was, with its old terminals and system of ferries, consistently serving the public and, as further stated by the Times—the road was not compelled to build this station either by law, by any public service commission's mandate, or by popular clamor.

But, as the Times stated:

It is a purely voluntary addition to its facilities, the idea of which was born in the mind of A. J. Cassatt.

The directorate of the company erected in a conspicuous place in that station a bronze statue of Mr. Cassatt, with the following inscription carved on the stone setting:

ALEXANDER JOHNSTON CASSATT, PRESIDENT PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD COMPANY, WHOSE FORETHOUGHT, COURAGE, AND ABILITY ACHIEVED THE EXTENSION OF THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD INTO NEW YORK CITY.

To the millions of people who will annually inspect it, this inscription may be a suggestion that they are being daily charged on the food they eat, the clothes they wear, and the luxuries, if any, they enjoy, their quota for the construction, maintenance, and interest on invested capital for this "purely voluntary addition" to the world's great terminals.

The truth is that the terminal is an involuntary gift to that city by the people generally, and is not a voluntary gift by the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., as suggested by the Times, but was voluntarily built by that company and its cost is added to the freight charges on the food the poor people of New York and elsewhere eat and the clothes they wear. Not only that, but every farmer and laborer in the United States, and all people, in fact, are, by the law of general average, being taxed for that terminal. It subtracts from the advantages of the people and is one more of the colossal monuments of vested property on which to tax us and our children and all future generations, so long as we measure progress by an erroneous standard.

And the Times, to further display ignorance, or else the sophistry of its editorial writer on that occasion, wound up the editorial:

The new station is not only an example to other public-service corporations, but should serve to warn the public against too ready acceptance of the doctrines and calumnies of self-appointed teachers and guides who make the vilifying of great business concerns their profession.

Surely the "example to other public-service corporations" served to cause another great railroad in the same city—the New York Central—to begin a like terminal, which is now well under way, which, when completed, will cost a sum approximately equaling that paid for the Pennsylvania. These and other stations in other cities costing extravagant sums all have their share in making the cost of living higher, for all these railways are authorized to charge higher freight rates, in order to get "legitimate" returns on capital invested. Consult the court decisions about that. The courts have answered by decree—a grim reality that was far removed from the editorial inspiration of the Times.

Who presents these grand gifts to New York and other cities? It is absurd to say the railroads do. We can excuse the Times' editor, for he was dazzled by the magnificence of the terminal station opening in his own city, but those he chooses to call "self-appointed guides and teachers" should not be invited to slink away into retirement, just because the editor saw only one side, and that the selfish, of a proposition that involves every human being who, while this system lasts, has now or in the future to earn his daily bread.

These "purely voluntary additions," as the Times calls them, are built in many cities without regulation, excepting that suggested in the inscription referred to as Cassatt's "forethought, courage, and ability"; and the "vested interest" in them appeals to all future people with a court's decree—we, the vested interests, have a right to charge you, the people, interest on our capital and add it to the freight rate on your food and your wares and make you and your posterity pay for it. To have escaped this decree you should have been born before civilization commenced.

The building of the terminals should be regulated so that the railways could not build two where but one is needed, and the cost also should be confined to a reasonable sum.

The inducement for building extensively for the use of the future is that capitalists find in it a means of converting the collective energy of the people into producing a fixed capital, and then charge the people interest on the capital that they have created by their own energy.

It does not require a profound student to see that the collective energy of the people applied to the use of modern machinery controlled by the Morgans, Rockefellers, Cassatts, and others, will rapidly produce a capital so enormous that the "vested rights" as now interpreted by the courts will, if we let things go by this plan, make us and our posterity the abject serfs of the capitalists. We shall have to regulate the constructions if we would avoid the absolutely certain dependence that will rapidly overtake us in following the rule of the court.

In the Minnesota rate case, lately decided, the court held that the railroad companies were entitled to 7 per cent as a reasonable return upon their capital, practically holding, at the same time, that the increased value of property, caused by the necessities of an increased population, might be taken into consideration and that the railways are entitled to interest on that, too.

The value of the property in the United States is approximately $125,000,000,000. Following the construction of the court, the owners are entitled to tax the people for its use 7 per cent after their expenses are paid, which would on compounding double in about 8 years, be four times that in 16 years, and eight times in 24 years. At that rate the average interest charge per capita 24 years from now would exceed the present average earnings of the wageworker. None but capitalists would then be able to educate their children. Already 80 per cent of the capital is owned by about 3,000 individuals and concerns.

Instead of looking at the economic facts and the industrial tendencies of things we have drifted into the habit of turning away from these and listening to politicians tell how they are going to remedy all this high cost of living with a simple revision of the tariff. It is the sheerest nonsense. The longer we are fooled with that pretense the more difficult it will be to solve the real economic problems in a proper way, and the greater the sacrifice will be.

Mr. Bryan recently stated to his Democratic brethren:

The Democratic Party can not hope to fool anybody very long by a one-sided application of the doctrine to the few districts which happen to contain protectionists.

Mr. Bryan was referring to his objection to the Democrats supporting a protective tariff and labeling it a tariff for revenue. His plea was for an honest statement of the facts. He was speaking in the capacity of an honest citizen more than as a Democrat, and the moral of the statement is worth something to the citizen who would know the real purpose of his Government. But Mr. Bryan still holds to the position that the tariff holds a greater relation to the cost of living than it really does.

Mr. Bryan was advising politicians when he made the statement I quoted. At the same time he stated:

* * * It may be well to remember that the voters of all parties are braver than politicians. The Republican voters were brave enough to turn out a lot of Republican Aldriches. What reason have our Democratic Congressmen to think Democrats are less courageous?

Differences of opinion are to be expected within the party as well as without, but expediency as well as honor requires that the differences shall be frankly stated, courageously fought out, and fairly settled.

Honest people generally, of whatever political faith, admire Mr. Bryan; but whether they do or not, to use his language, expediency as well as honesty requires that the differences should be frankly stated, courageously fought out, and fairly settled.

I expect to show that there is something other than frankness, courage, and fairness in the Government administration by those to whom the people have delegated that duty. First, however, I shall make some observations on principles that must be recognized and practiced before we can have lasting prosperity for all industrious people.

Commercial evils can not be corrected until we understand the true principles on which to proceed. Until then we shall run by opposites, sometimes having good times, sometimes bad ones, but never the best that natural conditions consistently followed would give us.

I would not advise a lie to anyone, but if one does lie least of all let it be to himself, for one is necessarily fundamental to himself. Every citizen may truly say he is the Government, and as such it is of the utmost importance for him to be honest with himself.

The Government does not and can not furnish us a living so long as we are a part of it. If we commit crimes and lose our right of citizenship through conviction, then we may be supported by the Government in prison. We must support ourselves, however, under all proper circumstances, and the functions of government are to regulate our relations with each other where necessary, and we must support the Government.

Speaking of our collective interests, we shall always be most heavily burdened in those things that we require the Government to do for us, and the least burdened in those things we do for ourselves. Those things that are natural for the individual to do and that he can do without interfering with others he should do; some things it is necessary that the Government should do, and in others it is necessary that the Government should regulate. The problem is to determine where to draw the line so as to keep things running to the best general advantage.

The trouble now is that we are out of proper economic relations with each other, and we are not in natural economic relations with other countries. As a Government we have power to regulate our relations with each other, but we can not control our relations with other countries except, if we can, by mutual agreement. We have nothing to do with the people of other countries in their relations with each other nor the relations of their people among themselves. Whatever they may be, good, bad, or otherwise, we must treat as conditions with which we can not deal, and we must accept of the facts. They are facts and affect us materially.

At this time I shall not enter into extensive detail in discussion of financial problems, but they have had more to do with the high cost of living than the tariff problem.

True economic relations with each other in our own country can not exist on the present financial basis. True economic relations with other countries can not be established on the present financial basis. Under the present systems we are bound to have good and bad times alternately, even if the natural conditions should remain the same. We may in time correct our own financial system, but we have no power to correct the systems of other countries except so far as our actions may serve as an example to direct their reasoning.

We can talk on the tariff until the sun shall cease to exist and make new tariff laws every year, but the problems will still be unsettled and the tariff as much of a political ghost as it is now and the times as unsettled, until the financial problem is established on a true basis.

By its nature the money that we now use is fictitious. Just as long as we treat money as our god and treat useful property as of less value than money, fictitious money, just that long the most of us will be poor.

The ordinary bills of exchange and promissory notes given by ordinarily prudent business men to other prudent men have more of the true intrinsic relation to the fitness of commerce than the money we use, for the prudent man will not give his note unless he has resources out of which it may be paid, and much less will the prudent man accept of it unless the maker has. If we had a commercial money backed by intrinsic value, it would be sounder and better than our present money.

Why is it that, with all the natural provisions made by God, we allow our intelligence on economics to be so deceived that we allow this prostitution of property by money?

Property is the real, true servant of the people; money is not; but by a cunning device to prey upon perverted imaginations the world's money changers have been able to surround money with a magic halo that has come down through the centuries and has finally culminated in giving the money system the control of property. If we continue spellbound by that hallucination, we shall become more and more subservient to the money power as the natural advantages become more and more controlled by it.

I say, Mr. Chairman, that we should understand the proper purpose of money and the natural use of property and fix our laws regulating commerce on a natural basis. This is the province of Congress to do, and when we do that right we shall end our trouble with the tariff problem; then the financial problem will operate by an economic law instead of by the present speculative gamble. When we learn that and base our action on the knowledge, then we shall not export valuable property in exchange for money with fictitious value; but when we do export, it will be that which we do not need and in exchange for something we do need. In the initial it might be evidenced by commercial money. When we learn to know those things and realize their full significance, the greatest step forward ever made in human progress will be established.

With the clearing away of the belief in money as of intrinsic value the standing armies and the navies of the world will be disbanded; then the energy of the individual may be converted to the advantage of those for whom he would wish to apply it; then the hours of labor could be more nearly fixed by the necessity of the individual. There would be no motives for strikes and lockouts, and they would cease.

Conservation is the easiest of our problems if we adjust it to the natural order of things. It does not require the kind of aid that is now being attempted; nature practically takes care of herself if she is not prevented or abused by us.

The first thing we should do is to provide a true exchange basis; one that is not especially adapted to creating speculators and gamblers who manipulate the markets so as to give themselves the control of the products of the natural and legitimate producers.

By this false system that we operate under property is controlled by money, and as it is the property that we must actually use, money has the power of making slaves of us. Valuable property should secure money when it is needed, and since labor energy is the means of producing property, if property controlled money, then we should be able to settle the financial problems in the application of our daily energy and we should have no hard times except if nature herself failed.

Commerce should not arbitrarily be riveted to gold any more than to other coexisting commodities. It is because of binding commerce to an arbitrary money that we have panics sometimes in the midst of plenty, and we have had them even when nature was most responsive to the common needs, which is proof enough that the present system is wrong.

The interchange of properties should rest on intrinsic values as related to the respective properties, and money should serve only as a medium of exchange without itself being used as a commodity, but should be secured in its purpose by full credit in its use to purchase by reason of its support by the commodities. Pure credits serve to transact approximately 95 per cent of the business; therefore, on a stable currency there should be no necessity for money representing more than a small per cent of the value of commerce.

The fact that we have not had a commercial money is largely responsible for the present control by the trusts. That fact has had far more to do with building up trusts than the tariff had.

I am not basing my remarks on imagination or theory, but on years of careful study and close observation of things in actual occurrence. I have watched business more than I have read books.

Take the panic of 1893 and following years. If we had then had a commercial money there would have been no extended disturbances. The losses would have been confined to those who were not on a sound basis, whereas under the arbitrary gold system existing many institutions were swept into bankruptcy which under any ordinary calculations of credit were sound.

After the 1893 panic there was a new alignment of business, and under that the trusts increased their control. The commonality during those years of panic lost billions in idleness and otherwise, while the plutocrats, considered as a class, lost nothing.

After this reorganization there was a period of prosperity for the trusts. They increased their fortunes enormously and many small institutions were launched in that boom. The commonality also recuperated and profited more or less in the same period. Any person could then easily get employment. The speculative gambling influences that had been working in previous periods were at work in this period, and after the gambling spirit had gotten to a point where it could no longer profit by the rise the arbitrary money system was again resorted to to put prices down and to give the trusts another clean-up.

The panic of 1907 eliminated a lot of the small institutions that interfered with the trusts. The year 1907 responded with one of the greatest crops in the history of the country, but notwithstanding that fact no one doubts that Morgan and Rockefeller had at that time the power to precipitate the country into such a state of bankruptcy as the world had never known, but all they did was to let it drift until they absorbed institutions that were not before directly under their control.

The 1907 panic gave the trusts greater control of things in general. I do not charge, though many do, that the panic was brought on for the very purpose of giving the trusts further control. That is not the vital point in my discussion.

Any person who observes closely and is familiar with our banking and money system and with the gambling spirit of the country and of the world understands that under our system we are certain to have panics. If nature should respond in bountiful regularity each year, we would still have them. It is that fact that is vital in our consideration.

It is bad enough that a few money and credit men should be able to bring on panics practically when they please, but it is still worse that we should have a system under which not even these greatest of gamblers and financiers can prevent recurring panics. The loss through enforced idleness, and otherwise, of the 1907 panic ran into the billions.

Gold is the same as other property in nature, a mere commodity, but the money changers early saw that in its use as money there was an opportunity to subject all other property to their control and make them the arbiters of the world. It was done by monetizing gold.

Not long since there was an attempt to monetize silver. That would not have helped us out of our difficulties.

Some financiers now fear that the gold production is too great, and that if it continues to increase we shall have to demonetize gold. No one has yet suggested a new property to monetize instead of gold. I mean none of the great money changers have.

It is held by some that the Government may issue greenbacks and claiming that all the wealth of the country would be back of them. How would they convert them if they wished? They could not specifically take your or my property, giving us the scrip, if we did not want it, and we might not wish it unless the Government taxed us so high that we had to use it to pay taxes. No; greenbacks or fiat money, as it is ordinarily understood, would not remedy conditions, but would create further confusion. It would not respond to natural commerce.

Money controls property, and since the money changers are by law given special privilege to regulate credit they control property—that which we must have for our everyday lives. That is not a protective tariff; but the law, point blank, gives the money changers the power to control as they wish our everyday energies by the use of money and credit.

Nelson W. Aldrich, chairman of the Monetary Commission created by the Aldrich-Vreeland law, comes forward now with a proposition to enact a law to give the money changers still greater control. He proposes a modification of the present system.

If money power is to be continued as the lord of both property and our lives, the Aldrich plan is suited to do it. It has some strong provisions to give the money changers a broader, more extended, and united control of finances. If we favor giving additional advantage to the money interest alone, there may be credit in the Aldrich plan, even to what I might term the "wards" of the money changers—I mean the plain people—for finances get into a runaway state at times, so that even the money changers can not do as well by us as they wish. They do not want to destroy us, for they monopolize and appropriate the result of our energies.

If we would wrest ourselves from under the power of the money changers, we must make property, that which our everyday energy produces, the control of finances.

If instead of giving to the money changers all the power to control we give property its true place in commerce, we shall bring about natural commercial relations between money and property and applied labor. We should then have the condition of the times regulated by the energy given to producing useful property, and that energy would be largely within the control of the commonality.

To make my position clearer, if I can, I will suggest a dual plan. I do not pretend that this tentative plan is at this time complete or without fault, for I am merely suggesting general principles with something of detail applied to our common necessities in the same way that the Aldrich plan applies to the money changers' desires. Later I shall present the plan in a more complete form.

Aldrich's plan is to create an association of the banks and make it the system to control money and credit, which would give it incidental power to control prices of property. He does not lose sight of the value of credit.

The management proposed by Aldrich for his plan is a masterpiece. If Aldrich was in education and sympathy with the commonality instead of with the trusts and the oligarchy, he would have evolved a plan that would have been a great step forward. While his plan can not as a whole be used with safety to the people, nevertheless the management he proposes may, if controlled by the people, be copied in much of it, for a system that would be suited to the common interests. If Aldrich had not sought by his plan to bring the world under the control of Wall Street and to go into foreign countries with the United States practically backing up a great speculation, in many respects it would be suited to hold in steadiness our finances. The system of management proposed by him suggests what may be done in the common interests, and we are indebted to him for suggestions. We should eliminate the features of his plan that contemplate the invasion of foreign markets for speculation and also eliminate those provisions that are in the interest of Wall Street and build on some of the ideas it presents—a system in support of good banking.

We are not in legislative work for the bankers. Banks serve a useful place in our business relations, and we should seek a system that will not encumber them. The present system does encumber the banks when they might be of the most assistance to the public. When funds are most needed in times of panic the banks are compelled by our cumbersome system to refuse assistance. The bankers are among us in our communities and take an interest in building up the places where they live. They hold in trust our funds and they prefer that those funds should be active in the locality where they do business, but our laws prevent it. But if we should accept the Aldrich plan as presented, the country banks would all be compelled to come under the control of Wall Street. We should pass such laws as will enable the banks in times of stress to make the utmost safe use of the funds they control in relieving distress. That is of importance and, even though our money system is wrong, we should not fail to provide legislation that will make it serve the best it can. That will not prevent the adoption of other and better money systems.

Aldrich's plan for his proposed Reserve Association is wonderfully clever in its arrangement for capture by Wall Street as soon as it should get into operation. It is proposed to start it with power distributed to the banks in general, and if it were left to the banks in general as they are now, the country would not fare so badly; but the tentative plan of Aldrich for the management of the several associations culminating in the Reserve Association of America is very cleverly arranged so that the Wall Street moneyed interests would not have any difficulty in taking it over. I shall analyze his proposed management on another occasion.

The Aldrich plan would create no disturbance in what is now termed the financial world and it would give to Wall Street a greater control of the finances of the country and additional power to extend their control to all the world.

Gold has no other quality than a commonalty, except that which law and practice give to it. I suggest that other property be given equal legal credit and to let commerce fix its status. Other property should have equal legal standing and then let each property compete with all other, holding their relations in commerce with the commonalty's necessities. In the Vreeland-Aldrich currency law this principle was recognized, but in the favor of special interests instead of the commonality.

If property were given its natural position, there would be no panics; there would be no poor, except those who would not work.

Aldrich's proposed articles of association for the money changers to guide them in their control of the credit of the commonality is not complicated in principle, though necessarily it is somewhat so in detail.

Since Members of Congress are all familiar with the Aldrich plan, I shall quote only such parts as are of importance in connection with my discussion. They are as follows:

RESERVE ASSOCIATION OF AMERICA.

CHARTER AND LOCATION.

It is proposed to charter the Reserve Association of America, which will be the principal fiscal agent of the Government of the United States. The authorized capital * * * shall be approximately $300,000,000. The length of its charter shall be 50 years. The head office of the association shall be in Washington, D. C.

The country shall be divided into 15 districts, and a branch of the Reserve Association shall be located in each district.

The Reserve Association and its branches shall be exempt from State and local taxation, except in respect to taxes upon real estate owned by it.

CAPITAL.

Only national banks of the classes hereinafter provided for may subscribe to the capital stock * * *. A national bank having a minimum capital of at least $25,000 may subscribe * * * and * * * become a member of a local association * * *. Fifty per cent of the subscriptions to the capital stock of the reserve association shall be called in cash; the balance of the subscriptions will remain a liability of the stockholders, subject to call.

Shares of the capital stock * * * under no circumstances may be owned by any corporation other than the subscribing national bank * * *.

LOCAL ASSOCIATIONS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

All subscribing banks shall be formed into associations of national banks, to be designated as local associations * * * each composed of not less than 10 banks, and the combined capital * * * shall aggregate not less than $5,000,000. * * *.

DIRECTORS OF LOCAL ASSOCIATIONS.

Each local association shall elect annually a board of directors * * *.

DIRECTORS OF BRANCHES.

As heretofore provided, all the local associations shall be grouped into 15 divisions, and each of these divisions shall be designated a district. There shall be located in each district a branch of the reserve association. Each of the 15 branches of the reserve association shall have a board of directors * * *.

DIRECTORS OF THE RESERVE ASSOCIATION.

The board of the reserve association shall consist of 45 directors * * *.

FUNCTIONS OF THE LOCAL ASSOCIATIONS.

Any member of a local association may apply to that local association for a guaranty of the commercial paper which it desires to rediscount at the branch of the Reserve Association in its district. * * *.

FUNCTIONS OF THE RESERVE ASSOCIATION.

All the privileges and advantages of the Reserve Association shall be equitably extended to every national bank of any of the classes herein defined who shall subscribe to its proportion of the stock of the Reserve Association and shall otherwise conform to the requirements of this act.

The Government of the United States and those national banks owning stock in the Reserve Association shall be the sole depositors in the Reserve Association. All domestic transactions of the Reserve Association shall be confined to the Government and the subscribing banks, with the exception of the purchase or sale of Government or State securities of foreign governments or of gold coin or bullion.

The Government of the United States shall deposit its cash balance with the Reserve Association, and thereafter all receipts of the Government shall be deposited with the Reserve Association or, when necessary, with such national banks as the Government may designate for that purpose in cities where there is no branch of the Reserve Association. All disbursements by the Government shall be made through the Reserve Association.

The Reserve Association shall pay no interest on deposits.

The Reserve Association may rediscount notes and bills of exchange arising out of commercial transactions for and with the indorsement of any bank having a deposit with it. * * * The amount so rediscounted shall in no case exceed the capital of the bank applying for the rediscount. * * *

The Reserve Association may also rediscount for any depositing bank notes and bills of exchange, * * * but in such cases the paper must be guaranteed by the local association of which the bank asking for the rediscount is a member.

Whenever in the opinion of the governor of the Reserve Association the public interests so require, such opinions to be concurred in by the executive committee of the Reserve Association and to have the definite approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Reserve Association may discount the direct obligation of a depositing bank, indorsed by its local association, provided that the indorsement of the local association shall be fully secured by the pledge and deposit with it of satisfactory securities, which shall be held by the local association for account of the Reserve Association. * * *

The Reserve Association may, whenever its own condition and the general financial conditions warrant such investment, purchase to a limited amount from a depositing bank acceptances of banks or houses of unquestioned financial responsibility. * * *

The Reserve Association may invest in United States bonds and in short-term obligations * * * of the United States, or of any State, or of certain foreign Governments. * * *

The Reserve Association shall have the power, at home and abroad, to deal in gold coin or bullion, to grant loans thereon, and to contract for loans of gold coin or bullion. * * *

The Reserve Association shall have power to purchase from its depositors and to sell, with or without its indorsement, checks or bills of exchange payable in England, France, or Germany, and in such other foreign countries as the board of the Reserve Association may decide. * * *

The Reserve Association shall have power to open and maintain banking accounts in foreign countries and to establish agencies in foreign countries for the purpose of purchasing and selling and collecting foreign bills of exchange, and it shall have authority to buy and sell, through such agencies, prime foreign bills of exchange arising from commercial transactions. * * *

FUNCTIONS OF NATIONAL BANKS.

In addition to the rights now conferred by law, national banks shall be authorized to accept commercial paper drawn upon them. * * *

The organization of banks to conduct business in foreign countries shall be authorized. The stock of such banks may be held by national banks. The bank so organized may have an office in the United States, but shall not compete with national banks for domestic business not necessarily related to the business being done in foreign countries.

There shall be established a new class of national banks, to be known by a specifically designated name. Such banks may have savings departments and may make properly secured loans on real estate. * * *

Another class of national banks shall be authorized, which shall be, in effect, national trust companies, to be designated by some appropriate name, and to exercise all the functions and have all the privileges, including length of charter, which are given to trust companies by the laws of the various States. * * *

NOTE ISSUES.

There is hereafter to be no further issue, beyond the amount now outstanding, of bank notes by national banks. National banks may, if they choose, maintain their present note issue, but whenever a bank retires the whole or any part of its existing issue it will permanently surrender its right to reissue the notes so retired.

The Reserve Association must, for a period of one year, offer to purchase * * * the 2 per cent bonds now held by national banks and deposited to secure their circulating notes. The Reserve Association shall take over these bonds with the existing currency privilege attached and assume responsibility for the redemption (upon presentation) of outstanding notes secured thereby. The Reserve Association shall issue, on the terms herein provided, its own notes as fast as the outstanding notes secured by such bonds so held shall be presented for redemption, it being the policy of the United States to retire as rapidly as possible, consistent with the public interests, bond-secured circulation and to substitute therefor notes of the Reserve Association of a character * * *.

If the Government should adopt the policy of issuing securities at a higher rate of interest than 2 per cent the Reserve Association shall have the right to exchange at par the Government bonds which it may have acquired from the national banks, previously held by them to secure circulation, for any bonds bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent, but in that event the amount of annual taxes to be paid on notes based upon such new securities shall be as much greater as the interest rate of the new securities shall exceed 2 per cent. * * *

In addition to the authority to issue notes to replace any national-bank notes outstanding at the time of the organization of the Reserve Association it shall have the right to issue additional circulating notes as follows: The whole or any part of the first $100,000,000 of such additional notes shall pay to the Government an annual tax of 3 per cent; above $100,000,000 and not more than $200,000,000 may be issued at an annual tax of 4 per cent; above $200,000,000 and not more than $300,000,000 may be issued at an annual tax of 5 per cent; all above $300,000,000 shall pay an annual tax of 6 per cent.

All note issues of the Reserve Association must be covered to the extent of at least one-third by gold or other lawful money, and the remaining portion by bonds of the United States or bankable commercial paper, as herein defined, or both. * * *

The notes of the Reserve Association shall be received at par in payment of all taxes, excises, and other dues to the United States, and for all salaries and other debts and demands owing by the United States to individuals, corporations, or associations, except obligations of the Government which are by their terms specifically payable in gold, and for all debts due from or by one national bank to another, and for all obligations. * * *

A careful consideration of the Aldrich plan will disclose that it is not only the control of the finances of this country that are aimed at, but it is intended to be an association to amalgamate the finances of the entire world, so as to give them the control of the commerce of the world. It is the last step in the ladder, so to speak, to unite all the trusts in the world into one controlling power, to be under the guidance of a great financial head dictator. The next step by which would be reached the grand climax of the trust system.

The Monetary Commission, of which Mr. Aldrich is the head, made a summer trip to Europe, charging the Government as expenses, unitemized, $19,250.18, and paid in addition for documents and articles on banking systems of foreign countries a very large sum, probably over $100,000. The total expense of that commission up to the last published statement is $207,130.48. The Aldrich-Vreeland bill authorized the commission to spend money without vouchers. The Government is paying the expenses to stage things for the Aldrich plan.

In the Aldrich plan observe the following provisions:

All domestic transactions of the Reserve Association shall be confined to the Government and the subscribing banks, with the exception of the purchase or sale of Government and State securities or securities of foreign governments or of gold coin or bullion. * * *

The Reserve Association may invest in United States bonds and in short-term obligations * * * of the United States or of any State or of certain foreign governments. * * *

The Reserve Association shall have power at home and abroad to deal in gold coin and bullion, to grant loans thereon, and to contract for loans of gold coin or bullion. * * *

The Reserve Association shall have power to purchase from its depositors and to sell, with or without its indorsement, checks or bills of exchange payable in England, France, or Germany, and in such other foreign countries as the board of the Reserve Association may decide. * * *

The Reserve Association shall have power to open and maintain banking accounts in foreign countries and to establish agencies in foreign countries for the purpose of selling and collecting foreign bills of exchange, and it shall have authority to buy and sell through such agencies prime foreign bills of exchange arising from commercial transactions. * * *

All the above provisions for an invasion of foreign countries come into the Aldrich plan under the head of "Functions of the Reserve Association." Then by his plan, under the head of "Functions of national banks," he has the following:

The organization of banks to conduct business in foreign countries shall be authorized. The stock of such banks may be held by national banks. The bank so organized may have an office in the United States, but shall not compete with domestic banks for domestic business not necessarily related to the business being done in foreign countries.

The provisions, if enacted into law, and that is what Aldrich proposes, would complete the agency for a control of foreign commerce and finance. But Aldrich was not satisfied to give the money changers, under authority of the United States, that agency alone. He also wants the United States to back it with Government funds, which he provides for by the following:

The Government of the United States shall deposit its cash balance with the Reserve Association, and thereafter all receipts of the Government shall be deposited with the Reserve Association. * * * All disbursements by the Government shall be made through the Reserve Association.

Aldrich's whole plan is a well-devised scheme adapted to the use of Wall Street. Wall Street, backed by Morgan, Rockefeller, and others, would control the Reserve Association, and these again, backed by all the deposits and disbursements of the United States, and also backed by the deposits of the national banks holding the private funds of the people, which is provided in the Aldrich plan, would be the most wonderful financial machinery that finite beings could invent to take control of the world. And Aldrich proposes to make it the "fiscal agent of the Government of the United States."

But if, with all the reenforcement I have mentioned—that is, to support Aldrich's proposed Reserve Association—it should still be found that it needed more funds to conquer the finances and commerce of the world, Aldrich has it provided in the following:

In addition to the authority to issue notes to replace any national-bank notes outstanding at the time of the organization of the Reserve Association, it shall have the right to issue additional circulating notes as follows: The whole or any part of the first $100,000,000 of such additional notes shall pay to the Government an annual tax of 3 per cent; above $100,000,000 and not more than $200,000,000 may be issued at an annual tax of 4 per cent; above $200,000,000 and not more than $300,000,000 may be issued at an annual tax of 5 per cent; all above $300,000,000 shall pay an annual tax of 6 per cent.

In passing, I call attention to the fact that Aldrich does not propose that the commonality should buy Government bonds, if they want them, if the bonds bear over 2, and not more than 3, per cent interest. To prevent that his plan has the following paragraph:

If the Government should adopt the policy of issuing securities at a higher rate of interest than 2 per cent, the Reserve Association shall have the right to exchange at par the Government bonds which it may have acquired from the national banks, previously held by them to secure circulation, for any bonds bearing interest at a rate not exceeding 3 per cent, but in that event the amount of annual taxes to be paid on notes based upon such new securities shall be as much greater as the interest rate of the new securities shall exceed 2 per cent.

Aldrich also provides for scooping up the postal savings-bank deposits, but I shall dismiss, for this time, further consideration of the Aldrich plan unless by mere reference to explain my further remarks.

The Aldrich-Vreeland currency act and the creation by that act of the Monetary Commission was the initial step for a new field of exploitation; that is, to exploit the world. The emergency currency provided in that bill was a mere incident to the future complete control sought by Wall Street, the way to which is intended to be provided by the Monetary Commission's recommendation and the enactment into law of the Aldrich plan.

The breaking down of the protective-tariff system is also necessary to the exploitation of the world by the Wall Street crowd. The Aldrich plan, if enacted into law, would give it control of the world's finances. Wall Street assumes it has power in Washington to enact into law that plan, and now, in anticipation of that, it seeks to destroy the difference paid to pauper labor in other countries and what is paid to labor in this country, so that all labor may be on the lower plane. If Wall Street can do that, it considers the way clear to accomplish the end they seek, of making all the world alike serve it.

The procedure of the Wall Street crowd is so veiled that many innocent students and politicians, Members of Congress even, and people who are not politicians are blindly working to aid it. On the other hand, some of the knowing ones, to deceive the public, are playing the other side of the game. We have an example of that in the extra session. One step was to propose an agreement between Canada and this country and label it "reciprocity."

That agreement was prepared in secret, staged to take the people by surprise, and be passed before they should know its purpose. An extra session became necessary. The public press, with its power to mold public opinion, was taken care of in the paper and pulp schedule. The newspapers will save annually millions of dollars, but in supporting reciprocity the city press did not explain that. The country press to some extent followed the lead of the city press, but did so on the principles of reciprocity rather than in the favor of the specific agreement, for the press was supporting reciprocity before there was an opportunity to study the bill.

Some of its supporters say it is a beginning and others that a half loaf is better than none; the first are satisfied to exempt themselves and begin with others, while the second take the half loaf and leave the others no bread. Neither stops to consider that a people can not exist in peace among themselves if half are on a free-trade basis for what they sell to the other half, and that half supported by a protective tariff on what they return in payment.

To Wall Street it made no difference that the farmers would be scalped out of many millions of dollars and that labor should lose. To scalp from them is a regular practice of Wall Street. This time, however, the enemies that appeared in the foreground are public officials, some of them in league with Wall Street, but most of them innocent victims of one of the deepest laid schemes in the history of the country.

The so-called reciprocity is merely one step in a colossal scheme now staging for Wall Street to control the world. Wall Street well knows that under the confusion created by the Canadian agreement it will be able to break down the protective system by such piecemeal as will serve it best; it does not want to destroy it at one time, for that would not serve its purpose, so it seeks to begin with the farmers; it well knows that we can not long have a policy that protects in form a part of the people and not the rest; it knows that to begin that means to end in all free trade; it knows that if the farmers can once be placed on a free-trade basis ultimately all our industries will; it wants that to drag along for a few years, until the Aldrich plan can be made a law, and soon after Wall Street would own the world if we let things go its way.

If we had a people's money plan we should not be injured by free trade, but we shall be with Wall Street controlling the finances of the world.

The Aldrich financial plan is, indeed, monstrous but wonderfully suited to Wall Street, which would consider a people's money plan monstrous if supported in the same way by the Government. My proposition for a people's money plan is less monstrous than Wall Street's plan, and is equitable and in the common interests.

Instead of chartering Wall Street to own us, charter all the producers and property owners of the United States—a reserve association of America, to form a fiscal agency for the United States. The length of the charter should be at the pleasure of the people; the head office in Washington, D. C. For the purpose of an independent financial system the country should be divided into districts, one in each State, with the Treasury Department of the United States as the head and supervising office of all, to constitute a complete system for the issue of notes as currency, which should be exempt from State and local taxation, and that the amount of the issue should be limited as the charter would provide.

The above proposition in principle is on the same line of privileges to be given to all producers and property owners as Aldrich proposes to give to the money changers alone.

The charter should provide in detail for the management by directors and officers for the reserve association, the district associations, local associations, and so forth.

In a people's plan, instead of hypothecating credit the actual property would be hypothecated as a security. Receipts would be given to owners, and on these—a certain safe per cent of the value, coming within the provisions of the plan—notes could issue. These notes, in principle, would correspond with bank notes. The bank-note issue now existing could continue independent of this plan. Owners of property hypothecated, or their assignees, could relieve the property from custody by tendering the amount of storage charges and an amount of notes equal to those that had been issued.

In a people's plan each State would become a member of the reserve association, and the States should be subdivided into two or more local associations, and these again subdivided, where necessary, all to form a part thereof; but no local association should be formed within territory having a population of, say, for example, less than 300,000, and so far as practicable should have diversified business interests, and should be under the rules and regulations of the Reserve Association. The local associations should have charge of all hypothecated property and be subject to proper rules to safeguard securities. The local associations should guarantee all notes issued on property in their jurisdiction to the next highest division, and that to the next, and so on up to the Government, and the Government would be responsible to the bearer of notes.

After such an association was ready to act it would become important to fix on assets to be selected as a safe basis to secure the respective associations for note issues. This should be property of the various kinds selected as safe and in such custody as would insure its integrity. The Government would fix the rule of control. Upon such property such percentage of note issue could be made as would be within the limit of certainty safe.

A person whose property was in custody, holding his receipt, need not ordinarily surrender it for an actual issue of notes, for after the system once became established there would be no runs on banks, for there would be no actual or fancied cause for it. People would secure the currency only in case they wanted it, and it would always buy at the market price any property for sale.

The storage receipts could be taken to banks and would be the basis on which notes could issue. Banks could hold them, receiving such pay for transacting the business as would be reasonable and could send to the United States Treasury as many receipts at one time for note issues as they pleased.

The added system would steady the existing system and eventually would replace it without the least disturbance, for it would not be a forced system, but would be left to natural selection. Beneficial effects would be felt from the beginning in a better distribution of credit in proportion to the common needs.

The money would be redeemed as the property in pledge was wanted for use. It would pass current, for, in addition to being guaranteed by the Government, it would have the true assets back of it and those in practically all of the nonperishable staple commodities. Upon it could and naturally would be based a natural commerce, and the present financial gambling commerce would eventually cease. All property would eventually hold its relative value determined by the energy required to produce it and the requirement or need for it. Labor would then be rewarded in the relation of its importance to the production.

On account of the present system being fixed there will be prejudice against any dual system, but that prejudice would be removed, as a proper system would simplify all commercial relations. Property would become the basis for credit and the natural basis for notes to circulate current.

The notes would be made legal tender in payment of all taxes, excises, and other dues to the United States contracted after the enactment of the plan into law, and for all salaries and other debts, and demands owing by the United States to individuals, corporations, or associations, except obligations of the Government, which are by their terms specifically payable in gold.

Anyone wishing to contract to pay a debt in gold could do so, but it would soon be discovered that gold, except for its foreign use, would be less stable than other staples. It would not be long until America's gold would be dumped on the other countries if they wanted it more than we. They would soon wake up to the fact that it was not worth what they had supposed. We would not then be proud of exporting our more useful products to foreigners in exchange for fictitious money. We would want to get in exchange some product that we did not have or that we could not produce with equal advantage and that we needed or wanted. We would not need or want their money.

Of course I know the mere suggestion will be labeled as a dream. Every innovation is labeled that way. At another time I shall follow that out to an extent that will show that the whole present money system is a dream, although in some ways a convenient one.

The details of the Aldrich plan are much more complicated than the plan I propose for the commonalty. Aldrich bases his plan on the credit of an association and on the fiction or fiat of gold.

I would base a people's money on commerce only. It is a plan for sound money based on true principles of exchange with full credit in every dollar to buy all of the necessaries, and it would express the true relation between property and the means of its production—labor. Then our population would stay nearer to the sources of wealth and we would not depopulate the country and overcrowd the city.

There could be no cornering of money based on commerce because money could be issued on the things subject to commerce. People could produce the very things on which the money would issue. Business under that system, as now, would be largely a matter of bookkeeping in exchanging credits, but as all goods of value require storing, except when in transit or actually in the process of consumption, they would, under a proper system, form the basis on which commercial money would issue. The process would on the whole be less complicated than the present method of banking and of providing the money base, gold; but since the Government would be required to guarantee all money on an equality, it would have to regulate or control the local and district associations, and it would provide the rules and regulations and establish the system in such control.

Already in times of emergencies methods of extending credits beyond the ordinary use of money have been used. For example, in the last panic clearing houses in large cities and many private business concerns issued scrip that passed current at the time. Of course, it was not legal tender and no one was compelled to accept it in payment of a legal debt, but it passed current notwithstanding.

The plan I propose would supply sound money—the best the world could have—and it would be made legal tender in payment of all obligations not otherwise contracted, and once it is established it would be so much more stable than gold that none would be foolish enough to contract to accept payment of debts in other money. It would displace gold soon after it was established.

Such a system would at once place the producer in a position of independence. The farmer, the laborer, and producers in general would be absolutely independent of the trusts, and trusts would cease to exist, for the only thing that maintains trusts is the fact that they appropriate the common energies.

The farmers and the wage earners are compelled to work for the trusts under the present system, whereas under the system I propose independent próducing would start wherever the conditions made it natural. Then the country would adjust itself to the natural selection of the people. Now the trusts force commerce to go where they want.

Under my proposition the people can and would produce independent of the trusts and the latter would be forced by the law of true commerce to turn their holdings into the avenues of trade to be purchased by the producers on the basis of the natural energy required for the production and distribution. The energy required for the production and distribution would establish the price.

The system would act automatically. Banking would adjust naturally to this system as rapidly as it came into operation. The system of storage houses would be less complicated than they are now, for speculation would cease and there would be no shifting forward and backward of property except when required for actual use. There would be no waste of time in duplication of work as there is now. The amount of labor required would be immensely less, but there would be no disturbance because there would be labor for all who desired it, and all would desire under such circumstances to do some work for they would be the principal benefactors of their own labor. Then the hours of labor would be so much less that people would take more time for study and improvement. The morals of the world would gain to an extent that would change the very nature of the people. We should be on a higher plane generally.

I do not complicate my proposition with provisions for conquering the foreign markets either in finance or commodities. We have no need of their finance. Such commodities as they have and that we do not produce with equal advantage, or that we do not produce and that we desire, there are commodities that we do produce and that we can spare and that they want in exchange. The system that I propose will facilitate the exchange with a great saving over the present to the consumer's advantage.

Some may suggest that the trusts, now being in control of 80 per cent of all the capital, will by hypothecating that property be able to take out the same kind of money that we do, and thereby flood the money market and depress the value of this new money. Bear in mind that the money is not the thing to command in this new medium of exchange. Property is the intrinsic thing, and the money would be issued on a basis that would buy any kind of property at the natural cost of production, plus the energy required to take it to the place of consumption. That cost would be measured by the energy required to produce the property—mostly a matter of labor—and if the trusts undertook to hold their property away from the market we, through our labor, could set up an independent production. That would quickly bring the capitalists to a realization of the fact that if they held their property it would be no advantage to them. We could go on without interruption producing the things we require and let the trusts die a natural and peaceful death. There would be no danger, for without the assistance of labor the property of the trusts would be worthless. It is only in the enslavement of the wage earner and the farmer that the trusts are able to control.

Another objection may be stated by some, and that is that the trusts now largely command the means of production, and that we should be without the means of independent production for that reason. The trusts have not thus far undertaken to control the ownership of farm lands. It has been sufficient for them that they have controlled the markets through which farmers sell. There is yet a landed interest in the commonality that makes the people safe if they provide a means of application, and that would form a basis on which to build up a prosperous commonality, and, if necessary, without even taking the trusts into account.

We still have the power as well as the right of eminent domain, and when property is absolutely essential to the common good that is not otherwise available the right of eminent domain is sufficient to afford the means.

I do not consider it necessary at this time to follow out the plan in all details. But it would be very much more simple than our financial system is now and even in its administration less expensive, and in the saving through economic adjustment would be very many times more effective.

My purpose in injecting money talk into this tariff debate is that the tariff is one problem when considered with reference to the present methods of competitive business and would be quite a different problem if we had a currency based on natural commerce instead of speculation and gambling.

Referring to the immediate problem of tariff, it has been presented from all sides here and all kinds of figures have been given, with all kinds of deductions, and it is doubtful if anyone could present the subject in a new form. I think the most serious side of the tariff problem is that it is the ghost around which all our politicians hover, one set trying to induce the people to believe it the cause of all our industrial ills and the other stating that it is the cause of all the good times we have ever had. Both are wrong. No one could tell in detail where, when, or why these things are. That the tariff needs revision frequently all admit, for conditions are constantly changing. It is unfortunate that it should remain a subject for political quarrel, alternately sweeping parties in or out of control and keeping the country in a state of uncertainty.

This is a large country, but large as it is its industries to a great extent are trust controlled through industrial organization. When that can be done in a country as large as ours, it is positive proof that the same influences can, by the same methods, extend its control to the rest of the world. I have stated that there is a plan now to do so. In a measure it has already been done.

There is no doubt that if the tariff can be made to appear to the people to be the most vital problem and we are kept tinkering with it to the extent of having extra sessions called specifically for that purpose, by the time we get it settled the world will be on a new basis and the tariff will be immaterial. It will be like the Sherman antitrust law.

The inducement held out to the public that the Sherman antitrust law is sufficient to control the trusts and that it should not be amended is as ludicrous as any political hoax can be. That law has been on our statute books ever since the most of us were children. During its existence the trusts have been most prosperous and now control more of the necessities of the people than ever. Those who say that the people should wait for the Sherman antitrust law to take its course before they should take any other step in their own interests are little interested in the people or else do not observe the general course of things.

If the people can be fooled and made to wait on the many cases that have been prosecuted, and which are promised to be prosecuted under that act, till the law is construed, they will have given the trusts all the time they want or need.

In the little affairs of life if parties come into court with unclean hands, to use an equity axiom, the court turns them away, giving neither relief, but the Government brings into court these big industrial criminals and has them defined to be violators of the law, and the decree protects the criminals in the conservation of their property. It was so in the Northern Securities case, and it has been so in other trust cases.

Will some one cite a case that does not involve a great trust in which individuals conspire to violate the law, and they are brought into court, the court defines how they shall proceed to divide the property equitably between themselves? In common causes of that class the litigants are kicked out of court without relief among themselves. The trusts are dissolved because they are unlawful, but the decree defines the method of conserving the property among the criminals. We should enact a law to escheat their property when the court finds an unlawful combination. The State should take the property of the criminals.

All this litigation about the trusts and all this discussion about the tariff is a little side show by which to keep the people busy watching it while waiting for their problems to be settled on the initiative by officials who never have known the people's rights, while in the main the great work of the special interests is going on in order to secure complete control of the world's resources.

We need not be interested in those who have capital and live on their capital, except to make them work, if we can. Every able-bodied person should earn his living by doing useful work, for if he does not we support him, and if he is rich and keeps servants we support them, too, and if he is extravagant and builds great mansions, keeps up expensive estates, yachts, and has other extravagant habits, we pay for all that too.

Of what good is it that the rich employ much labor, unless that labor produces something that is of common use? Unless they do they are an actual burden upon the rest of us, for we must produce what they consume. Employment alone of labor is no advantage. Labor to be of common good must produce the necessities of life. These are axiomatic truths. Who will say that the employment of labor in providing supercillious and unnecessary entertainment for the rich and their families is a benefit? Some say that it is, claiming that it takes that much labor out of competition with other labor. That is an error of economic understanding. They compete in consumption instead and do not produce what they consume, and consequently they are supported by those who do the work of producing the means of life.

Labor is not by nature competitive. All production of useful property under proper conditions is so much added to the common store. Under proper social conditions all who are able should work and produce as much as they consume. In that way only can there be the full measure of prosperity.

Competition will not solve the social problems, but cooperation will; but our cooperation must be in the common interests, and not in selfish individualism, for the latter would exclude the majority from its benefits.

It is because there are monopolies that take all the surplus over and above the living expenses of the wage earners that the latter as a rule are poor.

If we had a financial system based on the true purpose of exchange, we could dump on the other countries all the gold we have that we do not need in our sciences and fine arts and receive their useful property in exchange. That would wake foreigners up and they would never thereafter trade their more useful property for our gold. The gold hallucination would be removed from the world and an exchange system established and all the world would soon come onto an economic basis, and individuals would then gain the advantage of their energy when properly applied.

We should not think that we can solve the riddle of high prices by the petty political speechmaking of Members against parties that is taking place here. We may change Schedule K and we may make other changes in the tariff that may be proper enough, so far as they go, but they will not go far to settle problems. The special interests will soon adjust to any action we take on the tariff so long as we do not take care of our more important matters.

It may be noted that the trusts are adjusting to the Supreme Court decisions under the Sherman Antitrust Act. The people are paying the expenses of the litigation in order that the trusts may know where they stand. Some of them are dissolved by decree, but the decrees are mere form, for the trusts carry on the work they organized for regardless of that fact. What is the difference if they accomplish their purpose by a community of interest or under the management of the corporation?

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RUSSELL). Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. LINDBERGH. In a moment. Yes; now.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman believe from what he has said there that the Standard Oil Co. will not dissolve?

Mr. LINDBERGH. I believe there will be a community of interest between all the subsidiary companies; that is, all interests that belong to the Standard Oil Co., so that there will be little or no benefit come out of the recent decision. The trust operations will continue just the same. It was so in the Northern Securities case, and it will be the same in the Standard Oil.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, does the gentleman also believe that the same thing is true of the Tobacco Trust?

Mr. LINDBERGH. I think that is largely so of that company, too.

The people need not look to Sherman antitrust acts, nor to any other antiacts for relief, nor to the decisions of the courts, for these require generations first for legislation and subsequently for judicial construction to find, when the laws have been enacted and finally construed, that the very nature of social things have so changed that the problems are all presented anew. It is not in the antiacts that we shall succeed, but in constructive acts we would.

The two great vital problems on which to proceed are transportation and exchange. They are the economic twins about which the great battles for settling economic problems must be fought. Settle those two problems right, and prosperity will continue as long as nature is responsive. These are many times more important problems than the tariff. To tinker with the tariff and neglect them is wasting our time in comparison.

Instead of giving all of our time to this antibusiness we should profit by the example of the great trusts. They show that they can defeat the commonality by their cooperation, and that means that we shall have to cooperate ourselves, for until we do they will continue to monopolize the field. They have grown stronger each year in spite of all the adverse legislation and the effect of public sentiment against them.

It will do us little good to fight the trusts or to tear them down until we cooperate ourselves and go ahead independently. We have been working on the plan of tearing them down, and leaving it for them to build up again. Do we suppose they will build up on any less selfish plan?

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINDBERGH. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. What is the trouble with the decision in the last two cases, those of the Standard Oil Co. and the Tobacco Trust, in your judgment, as to why it is not effective as to the dissolution of the trusts?

Mr. LINDBERGH. I do not claim that those decisions will not dissolve these trusts, so far as their corporate form is concerned, but I believe the community of interest that naturally exists among the owners of the different properties and individuals making up the trusts—if I am permitted to call them different properties—will continue to control the action of those who have the different properties. They will be operated for their selfish purposes.

Mr. CULLOP. Is that the fault of the law or of the officer who is prosecuting the cases?

Mr. LINDBERGH. I should not say it is the fault of the law. It is in the administration of the law.

Mr. CULLOP. Is it the fault of the Attorney General because he does not follow up the cases and enforce the law so as to make it effective and bring about the remedy which was desired?

Mr. LINDBERGH. In a measure, yes; but I believe that there is an economic principle that you can not put down, namely, that wherever there is a community of interest that interest will act in harmony with its component parts—that is, it will work out its own preservation to the best possible advantage.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. LINDBERGH. I will.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman believe that to the point that he would hold if criminal prosecution was had under the Sherman antitrust law the Standard Oil Co. and the Tobacco Trust would not dissolve? Does he believe the community of interest would continue to work under agreement in violation of the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law if the Attorney General applied that law ordinarily?

Mr. LINDBERGH. I do not, for the reason that men consider their liberty and their lives more important than their property ordinarily.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, just one other question. Do you not think it is the duty of the Attorney General under the decisions in the two cases, as the facts have been found and the law construed, to proceed with criminal prosecution?

Mr. LINDBERGH. I do.

In 1909 we had an extra session and we have now another, the purposes of both being deceptive in assuming in the first instance to solve fundamental problems. I have watched this thing closely since I began my work here, and it seems clear to me that there is no hope of relief in Congress until the people decide what they want and then elect their Representatives to execute their plans. It would do no good for them to take the words of the politicians for their guide, for to use plain Anglo-Saxon the politicians are liars. [Applause.]

If the people will give their attention to determine the basis on which we may succeed, the way will soon be opened by them for constructive legislation that will aid.

There are many ways in which legislation would aid in a better adjustment, but we are confronted with the discouraging fact that must be first overcome—that is, that this House has ceased to be the forum of the people. It is plain that in that capacity it has gone out of business. Some of the people's Representatives have renounced their office, lent themselves to a caucus system, and delegated to the caucus the privilege of doing what the people elected them to do. In that way some Members think they are relieved of their responsibilities.

No Member has any influence on the floor of the House after the caucus has once made its decision. No act, speech, or deliberation in the House now changes the result of caucus action.

The House has capitulated to an unofficial body at the present time known as the Democratic caucus.

It is not the first time in history that the majority membership of this House has committed treason, nor is the Democratic caucus the only caucus to have committed the offense.

I am not partisan in this consideration. I am talking against treason, and I unhesitatingly say—and I say it with the laws of the country and the Constitution in mind as my guide—that any Member who surrenders his action to the control of a caucus, whether it be of one party or of the other, violates his oath, is a traitor to his constituency, and commits treason against his country. I know that in this statement I am challenging the opposition of the trusts and their organs, for they will fight for the caucus system, and they will criticize me for opposing it.

I say, destroy the caucus, and then we shall have the government that is the people's. The caucus belongs to bosses and special interests. These try to make the people believe that large bodies can not act en masse. They say that of the senate and house in my State also. Each party here has more Members than the senate and house combined of the Minnesota Legislature; but the same argument is made there. What would be done if the people should happen to elect all the Representatives from one party?

It is in opposition to caucus and Executive control in connection with legislation that every citizen should rise in arms. This system is in its essentiality a system of the bosses and special interests. It is the most effective way by which they can secure legislation favorable to themselves, and it has been encouraged by them at all times.

The country has been discreetly taught to believe that the caucus is the place to settle political and legislative matters, and Presidents have been encouraged to bribe, using patronage as the spoils.

We have noticed the profound satisfaction of Democratic leaders over the fact that they have now a perfect machine that controls their individual membership. They take proceedings off the floor of this House to caucuses and there pledge the members to a unit and sear over their minds with the caucus stamp in order to make them believe that they are thereby relieved from any direct responsibility to their constituents and to the country. After that is done they are brought back to the House to vote, so as to make the action of the caucus legal; but it is all the action of the caucus and not the House.

On this wool schedule it was reported of the caucus in the Washington Times:

> Before the final vote was taken FRANCIS BURTON HARRISON, leader of the Bryan forces, presented his resolution for free wool as an amendment to the bill of the Ways and Means Committee.
>
> The amendment was framed as a compromise, HARRISON having discovered during the day he had no chance for free wool. He asked for free wool in 1916, with gradual reductions annually. Representative RANDELL of Texas offered as a substitute an amendment providing for free raw wool immediately.
> About these amendments the fight in caucus waged throughout the day and up to midnight, the Bryan men standing by HARRISON.

The truth of that report was not denied. After the long and arduous fight in that private caucus, to which the people were not admitted and in which the proceedings were secret, they were finally able to subjugate the conscience of most of the belligerent participants. These were Members of Congress and had all sworn:

> I do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion, and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office which I am about to enter. So help me God.

Is there anything in that oath that allows a Member to surrender to a private caucus?

But their oath, their districts, their country, and their God notwithstanding, in the caucus they were finally whipped to unanimity for the Underwood bill, except Representatives RUCKER of Colorado; ASHBROOK, FRANCIS, and SHARP of Ohio; and GRAY of Indiana. These were excused by the caucus for not violating their oaths. The action of the caucus in voting to excuse them shows the meaning of a caucus.

No matter what the Underwood bill is, so far as caucus action is concerned—it may be the best ever—but the action of the caucus is the place where the people's rights are defeated and the place where the order of the House is prostituted. The Members who refused to violate their oaths did credit to their constituents and the country. They are not shackled. They may vote as their constituencies require and as their country demands.

Those of us who were Members of the last Congress observed the consternation of the Republican leaders when they found that there was not a sufficient number in their ranks who would desert their constituents and the country to be tied up by the caucus system.

You Democrats who are playing the caucus game in order to pledge the vote of Members to the wish of your leaders or to even a majority of those in attendance can well afford to remember how jubilant the country was when on a few occasions the last House demonstrated that it could be a deliberative body. On those occasions you Democrats formed an important number of the independent Members.

You ought not to think now, because you are in the majority, that you can violate your oaths and the laws in order to enact legislation, even though it were for the public weal. There is an orderly way to enact true legislation and you would get better results to follow it, for the most of the membership of this House is prepared to work for their constituents, but your caucuses are destroying their opportunity to do so.

I do not impute to any Member who attends a caucus bad motives. I am not making these remarks as a personal or a party attack. I wish them to be understood as an attack upon one of the most vicious systems ever practiced by Representatives accredited to the people. You Democrats who now uphold and follow it, even though it be with the best of intentions, are sowing the seeds of sins to be committed in the future if the practice continues.

In the past the people have permitted caucus control, but that was done without knowing of its baleful ulterior results. The public now knows that the caucus system is the machine for ultimately defeating the people, and is an infringement on representative government.

It is no defense that the action of the caucus is sometimes in line with good purposes. We can not permit theft for even charity, nor for the purpose of returning to the owner that which belongs to him, for when the thief had perfected the act of stealing to a fine art, he would not return the goods, and that is equally true of the caucus, and when it is well established in a party and representative government is defeated by it, the machinery of the caucus is in shape for the convenient use of designing and selfish interests, and these do not hesitate to use it. It has been so in the past, and no one who understands the ordinary influence of human character doubts that it will be repeated with the same results in the future.

Representation proper is only once removed from the people; it is the delegation of authority by the people to representatives. The caucus is twice removed from the people. It is the delegation of the authority by the representatives who were given the authority by the people. The representative passes it along from himself to the caucus. The members of a caucus are not as such under oath; as such they have no connection with the people; they are a self-constituted body, usurping the rights of the House.

And person who presumes to favor the initiative, referendum, and recall and goes to a caucus is false to his own pretensions.

By this caucus system about half the Members resolve themselves into a body, and by a bare majority tie up the rest and make them vote in the House as they could not in the caucus, and thereby destroy their entire influence in the House and make the membership generally ineffective in this House. The tail wags the dog, figuratively speaking. That is, in effect, the caucus system that you, who pretend to be for the initiative, referendum, and recall, stand for.

Why do you not champion the rule which you upheld in the last Congress—I mean the rule of representative government—until we do get the initiative, and so forth? The caucus is not even as favorable as my illustration, for it is seldom, if ever, that all the Members of a majority attend a caucus, and yet partisans commonly assume they are bound by their party caucus whether they attend or not. There have been innumerable caucuses in the past where even less than half the membership of the prevailing party attended, but notwithstanding that fact the acts of Congress on matters of the greatest importance were controlled by a mere majority of those in attendance at a caucus.

And again, why did you allow many days for general debate on the reciprocity agreement after you had already decided in a Democratic caucus that the vote of the Democrats should be in the House exactly as the caucus dictated? You knew the debate would not influence the result. Did you do it to make the people believe that the House is a deliberative body or was it done to give Members a chance to make speeches for home consumption?

Why on every important bill do you call a caucus and bind your members to vote as a unit in the House when they do not in caucus? It is because your caucuses are held to deprive the House of its deliberative functions, and to rob the House of its most important right and duty. But when you do that you show that your spirit and minds are more closely in sympathy with a monarchial government than one embracing the initiative, referendum, and recall, which most of you claim to favor. Why? Because by permitting caucus decisions to take the place of Representatives in Congress you are getting the farthest away from the people's control. If only for the sake of consistency you, who believe in this caucus system, should denounce the initiative, referendum, and recall.

I am against the caucus because it is the weapon of the special interests to control legislation in its own favor. I am for the initiative, referendum, and recall because under it the people have a direct control of their affairs and it enables them to direct their servants whom they elect.

I want to say that there was a Republican conference this morning, and if I had not been preparing for my remarks today I should have attended, because I do believe in conference of Members for the purpose of uniting their experience in the consideration of measures that come before Congress. They could gain an amount of information there that would be well worth their time to attend; and I believe a Member attending should, so far as he consistently can, be guided by the prevailing action of a conference. In a conference no previous political slates or framed-up schemes tie up the membership like a caucus does.

We should oppose Presidents exercising influence on Congress, either by themselves or through executive departments, except that of the President's advice and recommendation.

The House is the only elective body that has anything to do with the Government, and when a President controls it by systems of personal favors, in the shape of patronage, to those Congressmen who will vote for so-called administration measures, irrespective of their honest opinion of their merits or demerits, he is guilty not only of bribery, but is also guilty of stealing from the people the only direct representation they have in Congress. It is a most insinuating practice; an insult to the people's intelligence; sets a most pernicious example; and shows an utter disregard for the form of our government.

The mere fact that the distribution of favors is so veiled as to make it impossible for the general public to directly connect and recognize the granting of the favor with the votes controlled by it does not in the least mitigate the enormity of the offense, for it is not the offenses defined by statute that do the most harm. Senators and Representatives have been alike guilty with Presidents in this practice.

The people themselves have been careless about this matter. Political schemers devise ways for molding public opinion, and in some instances for preventing, if possible, the public having any opinion, in order to let predatory associations control things in their own interest.

A Member who does the best he can for the people and who is at all sensitive to unfavorable comments that are engineered by scheming politicians, or who is amenable to unfavorable comments by a portion of the press, will be ill at ease in Congress, for there are many ways to defeat the aims or purposes of those who stand for the people. Among others, it will be found that busybodies back in their districts are at work, under secret directions of the politicians, spreading false and belittling stories. Secret false gossip is hatched out by conspirators. First it is whispered with a "don't-you-tell" admonition, but all the time it is intended to be told, and will be worked more and more, until honest, well-intending people can be got to believe it, and these are expected to do the gossiping. It is the real purpose of the conspirators to start things going in that way, and there is no way to forestall it except by constant, vigilant, public observation.

Then again, because a Representative who supports the people can not be bribed with patronage, office seekers are sometimes persuaded to repeat quietly around that the Member is "no good," "can't get anything for his friends," "what's he done, anyhow?" All that is peddled around in the hope that the people will fall into the habit of doing the same.

Then again, there is the Associated Press reports, which furnishes news to all the country by wire every day from every place, and that association, controlled as it is by the special interests, colors all the news it sends out so as to give it the most favorable construction to these interests and against the true representatives of the people.

And still again, in each district where there are many local newspapers a few may be secured to insert unfavorable comment, and any unreliable newspapers within the field, and sometimes reliable ones innocently, will insert those notices in their own columns and frequently add comments of their own, and by this process there are in most communities a few evildoers to keep the evil work in perpetual motion.

Besides these I have mentioned, there are many other means used to destroy the influence of those who would do their duty, but I think the most unfortunate of them all is that the Members who truckle to the politicians have the privilege of giving to their coconspirators at home the Government salaries to maintain them while they are sowing the seeds of falsehood, graft, and corruption. That is a part of the political scheme for making the people pay their own betrayers, and can not be remedied until our executive officials stamp out all political patronage and give the people and not the politicians the offices that are appointive.

The defeat and destruction of honest Representatives is not enough to save the selfish, for others would arise, but it is necessary to the selfish that they deceive the people to bolster up themselves. They must build up their own. There are innumerable resources for this, but even with all these the people discover them though sometimes much harm is done before they do.

The Associated Press reports are used to build up the selfish with a skill equal to that by which they are used to injure the honest. But the greatest asset of the boss is political patronage. That he can furnish at public expense. The people are taxed for it.

The most deceptive of all the methods used by the bosses is to pretend they are for the people. Some cases where it will do no harm to the interests they actually champion the people's cause and vigorously fight for the commonality on those occasions, but it will usually be found that where the special interests are concerned that things have been measured in advance and that the special interests can spare the boss on those occasions for what may be more necessary at other times.

So long as the present caucus system lasts and so long as there is special favor there will be those who will gladly accept of these favors even at the expense of their souls, and that is about the price here in Washington, and the price, too, for those that get favors back in the districts when they get them from some of the bosses here, but that is not in the way for them, for they only give to those who are ready to pay the price.

Another practice that prevails here, and that is opposed to good common sense, and is done for the purpose of defeating the people's rights, is to take the busiest Members and place them on the specially important committees.

There have always been able men here that were on inactive regular committees, and yet when special committees were appointed that had important work to do the work was heaped on those who were already overworked.

Looking over the appointments on committees for a number of years I can plainly see that that plan is a part of the general scheme to keep control in a very limited membership and to reduce the importance of membership as a whole. In other words, it is a part of the boss system of control. Take, for instance, the late Ballinger committee, which, I believe, has not been discharged. For the Senate it was NELSON, FLINT, SUTHERLAND, ROOT, FLETCHER, and PAYNTER, all appointed under the Senate system. The first four are Republicans, and it would be hard to find four who were more busy than these. They were all chairmen of very important committees. In the Senate at the time of appointment there were numerous Senators possessed of the necessary ability without arduous work on their hands.

Take the House end of the Ballinger committee. It was MCCALL, OLMSTED, Denby, and MADISON, Republicans, and JAMES and GRAHAM, Democrats. MADISON was a compromise as a recognition of the insurgents. The other three Republican Members who belonged to the regular organization were three of the busiest Members in the House, each on active committees. The House had at the time very many Members who were not in active work requiring immediate attention and who had the capacity and ability to do the work on this investigation, but the system had to have these busy men to maintain the power of the House within limited membership. Some of the members of the Ballinger committee were so busy that they failed to attend many of the committee meetings.

If we would do our work here in the right way, we would remove caucus, executive, and other special control of this House. We should then be in position to consider bills on their merits and demerits, with all Members giving their best efforts to their consideration. Then the time that is now consumed in general debate would be used to make and frame legislation in the open on the floor of the House for the people.

What a shame it is that it should be claimed that there is no time to do things in the House when it would take no longer to do our work here in the House than it does in caucus. The House might be in session instead of the caucus. It is absolute nonsense—worse, falsehood—to say that the House could not deliberate as well as a caucus.

This is a great country. It has the natural advantages to support a most prosperous people. To be sure, we have some serious difficulties, some of which I have mentioned in my remarks to-day; but notwithstanding these, there is no reason to be discouraged. Our people possess the necessary intelligence to find a way or make it.

I do not consider the trusts that now dominate and direct the business of the country into unnatural channels in order to make more profit out of the people's energy a difficult problem to solve.

It was inevitable that trusts should develop under our system, we having started wrong. They are a natural outgrowth of that system and are simply fulfilling an evolution to a higher progress. There is nothing like necessity to create a way. The trusts are squeezing the commonalty to an extent that makes it necessary to find a way, or make it, for the people's independence.

We are ready to take the next step up the ladder of progress. That is to be the people's step. It is for Congress to pave the way with legislation for constructive work. It is not tariff legislation that will pave the way, neither is it antitrust legislation, nor is it the creation of additional departments or new courts or additional judges, for of these we have enough, but it is in the enactment of laws that will enable the commonalty to work out its own destiny by the rule of natural selection so that its everyday energy may inure to its own.

I think my to-day's remarks and those I have made on previous occasions point out some of the most serious problems. My purpose in pointing out these is to direct the public attention to them so far as I could. My opportunities for investigation have been better than those that people in general possess. It is necessary that the public should know in order to direct remedies. I have tried to do my share in this work. I believe I have my bearings now, and I think the public has secured its bearings through various sources, the principal of which is that it is paying all the costs of false systems. In the future my time shall be principally given to the constructive end of the work. I shall exert myself in that direction to the best of my ability, and am ready to join work with any of my colleagues, irrespective of party affiliation, in constructing legislation in favor of the commonalty. [Loud applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I do not see the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] on the floor at this moment. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUSSELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 2355. An act extending the time for payment of balance due on purchase price of a certain tract of land; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. FINLEY, for one week, on account of illness.

To Mr. SMITH of Texas, for one week, on account of illness.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Wednesday, June 14, 1911, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 14, 1911.

The Senate met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Ulysses G. B. Pierce, D. D., as follows:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, for this day, commemorative of the love and devotion which gave to our country the symbol of our liberty and of our Union, we render unto Thee sincere and humble thanks. Keep alive, we pray Thee, in the hearts of this united people the fire of patriotic ardor. In Thy grace grant that evermore this may be the land of the free because the home of the brave. And unto Thee who rulest over the kingdoms of men, and whose we are, and whom we serve, be all glory in earth and in heaven, now and forever more. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ERADICATION OF CATTLE TICKS IN ALABAMA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 11th ultimo, a memorandum setting forth in detail the operations of the Department of Agriculture in the eradication of cattle ticks in the State of Alabama, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed. (S. Doc. No. 47.)

Mr. BROWN presented sundry affidavits in support of the bill (S. 2010) granting an increase of pension to Ransom W. Bailey, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented sundry affidavits in support of the bill (S. 2175) granting an increase of pension to Frank McDaniels, which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WETMORE presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Unions of Providence, R. I., praying for the ratification of the proposed treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NELSON presented a memorial of the congregation of the Seventh-day Adventist Chuch of Owatonna, Minn., and a memorial of the congregation of the Seventh-day Adventist Church of Fergus Falls, Minn., remonstrating against the enforced observance of Sunday as a day of rest in the District of Columbia, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. O'GORMAN presented a memorial of the Retail Merchants' Association of Buffalo, N. Y., remonstrating against the imposition of a stamp tax on proprietary medicines, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of Potsdam Grange, Sherman Grange, and Millerton Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, all in the State of New York, remonstrating against the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ROOT presented memorials of East Schuyler Grange, No. 576; Adams Grange, No. 391; Lake Placid Grange, No. 1171; Whitehall Grange, No. 922; Mendon Grange; Homer Grange, No. 834; St. Louis County Grange; Delphi Grange; Treadwell Grange, No. 1169; Stockton Grange; Riga Grange, No. 168; East Fayette Grange, No. 40; South Dayton Grange, No. 213; Lenox Grange, No. 43; Jefferson County Grange; Phoenix Grange, No. 920; Scotch Bush Grange; Glendale Grange, No. 548; Wawarsing Grange, No. 956; North Hannibal Grange, No. 672; Texas Valley Grange, No. 972; and Friendship Grange, No. 72, Patrons of Husbandry, all in the State of New York, remonstrating against the proposed reciprocal trade agreement between the United States and Canada, which were ordered to lie on the table.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am directed by the Committee on Claims to return certain bills to the Senate, with the recommendation that they be indefinitely postponed (S. Rept. 64), because the claims upon which they have been based have been sent to the Court of Claims, and are still pending there, and have never been reported back, so that these bills have been prematurely introduced, while the claims are in the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims.

The bills were indefinitely postponed, as follows:

A bill (S. 898) for the relief of James W. Kingon;

A bill (S. 961) for the relief of the heirs at law of E. L. Shuford, deceased;

A bill (S. 966) for the relief of the Zion African Methodist Episcopal Church of Beaufort, N. C.;

A bill (S. 967) for the relief of Grace Protestant Episcopal Church, of Plymouth, N. C.;

A bill (S. 968) for the relief of Salem Methodist Episcopal Church South, of Wayne County, N. C.;

A bill (S. 969) for the relief of Beulah Primitive Baptist Church, of Johnstown County, N. C.;

A bill (S. 970) for the relief of Spencer Etheredge, J. E. Berry, and Charles Meekins, trustees of Roanoke Island Baptist Church, Roanoke Island, N. C.;

A bill (S. 1266) for the relief of the heirs of William Samuel Custis;

A bill (S. 1268) for the relief of Luther H. Potterfield;

A bill (S. 1269) for the relief of Bland Massie;

A bill (S. 1270) for the relief of John Henry Edwards;

A bill (S. 1282) for the relief of the estate of Branon Thatcher, deceased;

A bill (S. 1287) for the relief of Norval Cox and heirs of Robert Rollins, deceased;

A bill (S. 1292) for the relief of James H. Hottel;

A bill (S. 1303) for the relief of the heirs of John A. Jones, deceased;

A bill (S. 1409) for the relief of the estate of Thomas W. Maides, deceased;

A bill (S. 1428) for the relief of Walter T. Dough;

A bill (S. 1433) for the relief of E. M. Felts;

A bill (S. 1440) for the relief of the heirs of John H. Richardson, deceased;

A bill (S. 1718) for the relief of Clara D. Miller;

A bill (S. 1740) for the relief of the heirs of John D. Rawlings, deceased;

A bill (S. 1741) for the relief of the estate of Richard Wiseman, deceased;

A bill (S. 1894) for the relief of A. M. Randolph and the other children and heirs of Robert Lee Randolph, deceased;

A bill (S. 2049) for the relief of owners of property at Popham Beach, Me., on account of depreciation in value of same by reason of the location of heavy guns at Fort Baldwin and the firing thereof;

A bill (S. 2392) for the relief of the estate of Edward Bedsole, deceased;

A bill (S. 2394) for the relief of Samuel H. Yarborough and estate of John Jones, deceased;

A bill (S. 2395) for the relief of the heirs or estate of James M. Alexander, deceased;

A bill (S. 2401) for the relief of David C. and Daniel W. Reece, heirs of Andrew Reece, deceased;

A bill (S. 2404) for the relief of heirs or estate of C. C. Blancit, deceased;

A bill (S. 2406) for the relief of heirs or estates of Elbert H. Ellett and Malinda Ellett, deceased;

A bill (S. 2407) for the relief of James Williams;

A bill (S. 2409) for the relief of Thomas Seymour;

A bill (S. 2410) for the relief of heirs or estate of Benjamin Lawler, deceased; and

A bill (S. 2690) for the relief of Alexander P. Hart, heir of Joseph Hart, deceased.

CLAIM OF THE METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I submit a resolution from the Committee on Claims, referring a case to the Court of Claims, which was inadvertently omitted from the resolution passed at the last session. I ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 64) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill (S. 1731) entitled "A bill for the relief of the Methodist Protestant Church," now pending in the Senate, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims in pursuance of the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States," approved March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Tucker Act. And the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMITH of Michigan:

A bill (S. 2751) providing for the erection of a post-office building at Hastings, Mich.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. CULLOM:

A bill (S. 2752) to correct the military record of Michael Fitzgerald; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BROWN:

A bill (S. 2753) authorizing the Winnebago Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims; to the Committee on Indian Affairs;

A bill (S. 2754) granting an increase of pension to O. L. Cady; and

A bill (S. 2755) granting an increase of pension to John Rosswork; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BURNHAM:

A bill (S. 2756) granting a pension to Samantha Putney Spaulding; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WETMORE:

A bill (S. 2757) granting an increase of pension to Catherine S. Wales;

A bill (S. 2758) granting an increase of pension to Sarah A. Peck; and

A bill (S. 2759) granting an increase of pension to Hannah G. Edgar (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WARREN:

A bill (S. 2760) to provide for the sale of the United States military reservation at Fort Walla Walla, Wash., and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GUGGENHEIM:

A bill (S. 2761) to amend an act approved February 6, 1905, entitled "An act to amend an act approved July 1, 1902, entitled 'An act temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes,' and to amend an act approved March 8, 1902, entitled 'An act temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes,' and to amend an act approved March 2, 1903, entitled 'An act to establish a standard of value and to provide for a coinage system in the Philippine Islands,' and to provide for the more efficient administration of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on the Philippines.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 2762) to correct the military record of Archibald Craig; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2763) for the relief of James P. Howe; and

A bill (S. 2764) granting a pension to Alta Breckenridge; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FOSTER:

A bill (S. 2765) granting a pension to Clementine Chapman; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas:

A bill (S. 2766) to authorize the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Co. to construct and operate a bridge across the St. Francis River in the State of Arkansas, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce.

STANDARD OIL CO. AND AMERICAN TOBACCO CO.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that to-morrow, at the close of the routine morning business, I shall have something to say on Senate concurrent resolution No. 4, instructing the Attorney General of the United States to prosecute the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed and the calendar is in order under Rule VIII.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, so far as its result upon the vote of the Senate is concerned, we might properly omit any discussion of this subject and proceed to dispose of it. This measure will pass the Senate by a vote of nearly 2 to 1. It will be supported by the Democratic side of the Chamber as a party measure, expected by them to destroy the Republican policy of protection, and will be reluctantly supported by a considerable number of Republican Senators, whose reasons, I presume, will be given in a mild form in the course of debate.

I do not expect that my discussion will change a single vote in this body. I do expect, however, that I shall be able in the course of my remarks to establish beyond any possible controversy that the enactment of this pact into a law will grievously injure the agricultural interests of every Northern State and will benefit the agricultural interests of no State. I do expect to establish this fact so clearly that no Senator shall be able to excuse his vote for this measure on the ground that by so doing he does not strike a blow, and a hard blow, at that particular industry; and that he must justify his vote, if at all, on the ground that some assumed national interest demands the sacrifice of the agricultural interests.

In the discussion to-day I shall deal with only one phase of the question—the injury to the grain producers of the country. Other Senators will show the effect of this measure on other industries, and I shall at another time deal with other features of the bill.

RECIPROCITY.

Very shortly after the reciprocity agreement had been consummated by the American and Canadian negotiators and its terms for the first time made public I carefully read all its details. It seemed to me then to be so one-sided in its intended benefits and so harmful to the interests of the people of the State I represented and so opened the doors for the admission of a Canadian product which I had long declared to our people to be the one great danger which continuously threatened their welfare, that I felt compelled to give immediate expression of my own views and those views which I had every reason to believe were held by the vast majority of the people of my State in an address upon the subject made February 25 last.

I believe that this treaty, if enacted into law, would not only postpone for many years the consummation of a hope indulged in by the farmers of the country, a hope that had been held out to them by every speaker and writer who sought to secure and hold their votes for the protective policy of the country, but that its logical result would be to destroy the policy itself.

And I knew, Mr. President, that either the political doctrines which I had held all my life were wrong or that this treaty was wrong. I knew that either the promises and encouragement which I had held out to the people of my State were ill-founded and illogical or that such promises and encouragement would be defeated by this measure. I must therefore either repudiate all I have advocated for years or oppose the consummation of this agreement.

Mr. President, so insistent has been the declaration of the President of the United States, than whom a more courageous, honest, fearless, and patriotic President never lived, so earnest has been the support of those whom I know have at all times had the interest of the people of the Northwest at heart, in favor of this pact, that since making my former address I have tried to see if it were possible that my political creed or my prophecy has been bottomed on faulty premises. While I would much prefer to be both consistent and right, if the two will not harmonize, I will abandon the consistency.

I have therefore faithfully attended every hearing before the Committee on Finance in which the question of the effect of this treaty upon agricultural interests was discussed. The evidence in respect thereto has been very full, very interesting, and, to my mind, very conclusive. Most of the witnesses who gave their testimony before the committee were men who had made careful study of the question and were able to discuss it in all of its bearings. The questions propounded by members of the Finance Committee were for the most part pertinent and searching. The spirit which seemed to dominate the committee was the desire to get at the truth, and it seemed to me that every question asked by any Senator of any witness was propounded for the purpose of eliciting information which would elucidate any theory or conclusion advanced or denied.

The hearings having been completed, the matter comes before the Senate with a great array of facts and figures. And if the evidence contained in these hearings has not had the effect of changing previous convictions of the members of the committee or of those Senators who will take time to read them, it has at least given them a vast fund of information which will enable them to refute erroneous conclusions.

Mr. President, it is difficult for us to divest ourselves of the influences of our life's environments, and especially of those convictions engendered during the formative period of our existence when we were first brought face to face with a world into whose conflicts we were sometimes prematurely hurried by the necessities of our situation.

Leaving a backwoods farm, the memory of whose hardships and limitations always touch into vibration every chord of my sympathy, for an occupation of greater remuneration and broader opportunities, I am compelled to admit that I carry a degree of prejudice in favor of my early companions and of all those who labor in the fields, whether through inclination or because controlling conditions have chained them to the reluctant soil. I start out in this argument with a conviction that never within the period of recorded history, never since cities were known, has the tiller of the soil lived on a plane of equality, measured by comforts, luxuries, or opportunities, with the dwellers of the cities, and that the wealth and grandeur of the cities of to-day represent a tribute exacted from the tillers of the soil. I have the abiding conviction that there is a wrong to be righted, and that it can only be righted by increasing the profits of country occupations to an extent that they will equal the profits of city occupations and trades so far as governmental agency can properly and constitutionally bring about such a result.

The earnings of the one class above that which insures comfort and reasonable recreation leads it into excesses and ostentatious show and rivalry that destroys every fiber of sturdy character. The meager earnings of the other, the denial of proper comforts, rest, recreation, and hygienic conditions must be detrimental to his highest welfare. A more fair and equitable balance of the income and the expense of each would be most healthful and beneficial to both.

Mr. President, we arrive at most of our conclusions in life through our sense of observation, and we acquire certain convictions that can not be shaken by any sort of statistics. But if we do study those statistics in the light of all surrounding conditions we will find that they will generally agree with what our observation teaches us. We know, for instance, that the majority of people live according to their means; that most people who have means to live in palaces do not live in hovels; that most people who have means to array themselves in fair and becoming fabrics do not dress in a shabby and slovenly manner; that most people who have means to travel do not tie themselves forever within the walls of their own homes. And when I go through this country and compare the average farm home with the average city home—and we always are forced to deal with averages—when I compare the home furniture of the one with the other, the shabby and meager clothing of the one with the other, the hours of labor of the one with the other, the opportunities and environments of the one with the other, the expenditure for luxuries and unnecessaries of the one with the other, I know that the farmer and the farmer's family receive far less for their labor than any other equally intelligent workmen in the United States.

And I further know, Mr. President, that the economic laws, whether of ancient or modern birth, which allow, or, at least, in this age of general enlightenment permit, this condition to remain, needs some amendment. I know we can not by legislative enactment remove great natural barriers or utterly overcome the great economic laws of the world's supply and demand as they affect the general level of values. But I do know that every great country through its revenue laws does, and purposely does, affect the value of the products of its important industries within its own borders and does protect, stimulate, and make profitable industries which otherwise could not stand the test of international competition. And to that extent I invoke legislation favoring the American farmer. If I can raise his financial condition so that his life will more nearly correspond with the life of the average inhabitant of the cities, I want to do so. If I can make farming more remunerative by law, I want that law.

If any of you believe that the farmer of this country is today receiving his proportionate share of income for his labor and capital employed, you will be justified in saying by your vote that he shall have no greater reward for his industry; and if you believe that his prosperity for the next century should not be superior to the prosperity of the average grain producer of the world, you will be justified in voting for this reciprocity agreement, because the certain effect of the vote will be to fix his status on that plane.

Mr. President, the farmer boy who, driving his broken and heavy horses with his load of vegetables or cordwood for city consumption, reverentially turns aside to yield the road to high-bred steeds, glittering harness, and spotless carriage, or who, by accident, may get a glimpse, through folds of silken tapestry, into some parlor whose shining floor he feels would be profaned by his step, may justly be excused if he does feel in his heart the stirring birth of some vague, indefinite hope that some day, some way, the walls of his own little cottage may be broadened and heightened and all his shabby surroundings brought to a higher degree of beauty, with its influence for refinement and culture. And I, who have followed this lad and know every impulse of his heart, may also be pardoned if I approach this subject from his standpoint and actuated by a desire to help him and all those who live his life to realize to some extent these hopes and aspirations.

Mr. President, I am not unmindful of some of the broad and statesmanlike reasons which guide the minds of many in supporting this reciprocal trade agreement. No one can deny that one of the principal factors that enter into national prosperity is the element of balance of trade. Nor is there any denial of the truth that as our agricultural surplus dwindles by reason of home consumption our balance of trade will decrease. In this connection it may also be doubted whether our manufacturers will be long able to compete in the world's market with the more cheaply produced articles of Great Britain, Germany, or Japan. With our exportation of food products growing less and our supremacy in the exportation of manufactured articles being very doubtful, we may well consider how we shall be able to maintain that balance of trade which has given us our great prosperity during most of the last 40 years. These trade conditions may justify those in supporting this bill who believe that by this treaty we shall be able to considerably increase the exportation of our manufactured products without materially affecting our agricultural exportations or the value of the home product.

Mr. President, we shall need the balance of trade. But will this agreement, if enacted into law, increase our balance of trade with Canada? If it will, will that increase be purchased at too great a price? If it will increase our balance of trade, of course we will all reap some benefit from it. It may be small, but every dollar of a balance of trade means something to every American citizen.

It may increase our exportations of farm machinery. As the Canadian Northwest develops, as it will undoubtedly enormously develop in the next decade, there will be a corresponding increase in the exportation of farm machinery for the Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba grain fields. I believe we will have that increase whether we have reciprocity or not. We are at present supplying the demand of that section even with the Canadian tariff to be overcome. With that tariff off the Canadian field may be a little more inviting. But will there not be an increase of agricultural importations from Canada that will more than offset the exportation of all manufactured articles into Canada? I feel certain this will be the result.

My investigation leads me to the conclusion that there will be an immediate increase in the importation of Canadian potatoes, hay, barley, flax, wheat, oats, considerable dairy products, and some cattle, and that in the grain trade there will be an ever-increasing supply from Canada as her new lands are being brought under the plow and our old lands are becoming less productive. One thing is certain, and that is, if our prices of cereal products continue on this side of the line to be higher, as they are to-day, than on the Canadian line, Canada will export heavily into this country until such exportations produce a level of prices. It may be that after the level has been once obtained and there will be no object in further importing from Canada into this country, the prices on both sides of the line being substantially the same, Canadian products will go directly to Europe instead of the United States. But the fact that she will have an enormous surplus for exportation, ready to be dumped into our markets the moment our prices rise above hers, will have the same effect in keeping our prices on a plane with hers as though she were actually importing into this country. This is so obvious that it needs no elucidation.

And I might suggest as a further fact along this line that there are two ways of increasing our balance of trade—one by increasing our exports and the other by diminishing our imports; or, expressed in other words, by buying our own products from our own people instead of buying them abroad. A dollar expended at home is always a dollar saved for home; and a dollar saved is always equivalent to a dollar earned.

The Liberal Party of Canada supports this treaty on the ground, and almost the only ground, that the American markets will afford them a field for vast exportations of agricultural products. The northwestern farmers of Canada support this pact for the same reason that the northwestern American farmers oppose it.

In his address to the Canadian Parliament on March 7, 1911, Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

> I stated a moment ago that the agreement we made is simply to get better prices for the products of the Canadian farmer. This is a proposition so obvious that I am surprised that it should have received the treatment it has received on the part of our friends on the outside.

It is perfectly obvious to the Canadian statesman that Canadian farmers will get better prices for their products, but it is not at all obvious to the supporters of this agreement that the American farmers must therefore receive less for their products. Will some of these mathematically inclined supporters of this proposition demonstrate to me how it is possible for the Canadian farmer to get more for his products by sending them into the United States if the prices are not higher in the United States? And if it is true, as I have always supposed it was mathematically true, that increase of quantity in a given market tends to decrease prices, how is it possible for the Canadian farmers' products to come into this country in any great quantities—such quantities as would greatly benefit the Canadian farmers—without tending to reduce the value of the American products? Whatever may have been the views of the American negotiators, this Canadian statesman declares the agreement was made simply to get better prices for the products of the Canadian farmers. He could not get better prices unless the American prices average higher than the Canadian prices, and he could not get his higher prices from the American side unless the products were exported from Canada into this country. So I have strong support in my position, outside of facts and figures which I will produce to demonstrate its correctness, in the well-weighed and carefully worded sentences of the Canadian premier.

And it is also evident that the Canadian statesman believed that the advantage was all with Canada; that while Canada would increase her exports of agricultural products into this country, we would not materially increase the exportation of manufactured products into Canada, except possibly the agricultural implements which I have mentioned; for in the same address he highly complimented the Canadian minister for—using his exact words—having obtained from our neighbors such an advantageous arrangement and having obtained it without the sacrifice of any Canadian interests. If I remember rightly, the only thing he admitted we might gain advantage in was in the exportation of our farm machinery.

Thus, then, do my views accord with the views of the Liberal Party of Canada, that we will not increase our balance of trade by this agreement, but, on the contrary, will diminish it, and Canada will increase hers.

Again, it is urged by our President, and I believe not without some justification, that now is the accepted time to enter into such commercial relations with Canada as shall assure to us the Canadian trade. "Now or never." In using these last words, with considerable emphasis, the President undoubtedly had in mind the great efforts on the part of Great Britain to secure more close political and commercial relations with her colonies. The effort of Joseph Chamberlain to bring about such a condition is recent history. Representation in the British Parliament by Canada would undoubtedly place the home Government in a better position to secure preferential rates with Canada than it at present occupies. But, Mr. President, unless Canada should surrender her autonomy entirely, which I do not believe she will do under any sort of an agreement with Great Britain, I shall still have faith in the continuing power of that element of human nature which we call selfishness. With her enormous surplus at our door we need have no fears that she will not be most glad to avail herself of the opportunity to enter so near a market whenever our diminishing home supply will justify us in opening that door. I shall still believe that a people with 3,000 miles of imaginary border line will always find means to enter into advantageous commercial relations when such relations can be demonstrated to be of advantage to both and without injury to the great industries of either. But the basis of such a commercial relation ought to be reciprocally just, one which should not surrender the interests of one great class of people of either country for the benefit of another great class.

But, Mr. President, I should feel compelled to vote against this measure for another most potent reason, even though I had some doubts, which I have not, of the correctness of my position. I know that the people of my State, not by a bare majority, but in overwhelming numbers, are bitterly opposed to the ratification of this agreement, and a vote in its favor would do extreme violence to their views and wishes. I know it is said by many that the farmers are not so much exercised about the matter as we are lead to believe. I have, however, taken great pains to ascertain the sentiment of the farmers of my State, and I know, as I have said, that they are overwhelmingly and extremely bitter against this Canadian reciprocity.

Mr. President, I have for years been preaching to the farmers of my State this doctrine: You are not receiving your full share of American prosperity; you are not receiving for your labor, hour for hour, anything like equally intelligent labor is receiving in other vocations; you are selling the products of your farm, the result of your labor, in an unprotected world's market and in competition with the farm products of the world, while everything which you purchase has an artificial and enhanced value, due to protective duties and the higher prices allowed for the labor employed in producing it. You can not remedy this by depriving others of their protection, for in doing so you will destroy your best market—the home demand. If you should put the laborers engaged in manufacturing on an earning basis equal only to that of the labor of the whole world, you would thereby decrease their purchasing power and diminish their ability to purchase your products. And what is still worse, by closing their mills you would send your own money abroad to be expended by a foreign people in the purchase of foreign products.

You are laboring under what is always a material disadvantage and a price depresser, namely, a surplus. The great question for you is how to get rid of that surplus. There are two ways of eliminating it—one by producing less; the other by increasing consumption. You have the land. It is particularly adapted to production. You can not allow that land to be nonproductive or to produce that which gives you no profit. It is far better for you to increase the home consumption to take care of that surplus, and maintain a living price, than to decrease your production. You also know that a home market has a greater influence in maintaining good prices, even though it may not take all of your surplus, than has a foreign market. The home consumption always reduces the volume of the surplus which otherwise would have to enter in competition with the world's production. The smaller the surplus the greater the value per unit.

Now let us look this condition straight in the face and see what is the best future policy for us as farmers. We can start our investigation with this assured fact: There is a natural limit to acreage and production; there is no natural barrier which will limit increase of population. Our population will go right on increasing, but when our available acreage is all converted into productive soil we can not add to that acreage. We may increase within limits the productiveness of each acre, but we can not increase the number of acres. It needs no expert mathematician to demonstrate that consumption will soon overtake production, and that your surplus will soon be wiped out. When we began to turn the sod of the prairies lying west of the Mississippi and east of the desert plains, we had a vast empire of fertile land to convert, and for a while production kept more than apace with consumption. Prior to 1870 we were producing about 250,000,000 bushels of wheat annually. In the seventies there was a wonderful migration to these western lands. In the later seventies we began to see the result of this western settlement. Within a very few years our wheat production mounted up to the 500,000,000-bushel mark. Since 1880 the increase has been very gradual. We can therefore take 1880 as the beginning of the era of the greater wheat production in the United States and use it as a proper basis for computation. In 1880 our population was, in round numbers, 50,000,000 and our wheat production 498,549,868 bushels. In 1910 our population was 92,000,000 and our estimated wheat production 675,000,000 bushels. In the last 30 years, therefore, our population has increased 83 per cent and our wheat production only 54 per cent. In a few years we will probably reach a stationary period in the production of wheat. Our best statisticians and those who have given the matter very great study believe that we can not, under present methods of farming, raise on an average more than about 700,000,000 bushels of wheat per annum. We will, of course, place some new lands under cultivation, but old lands which have heretofore been used for wheat raising must necessarily be used for other purposes.

Our per capita consumption of wheat is now about 6½ bushels. If our maximum production of wheat is 700,000,000 bushels it would supply the needs of 107,000,000 people, in round numbers. In other words, when our population is 107,000,000 wheat production and consumption will be equal. How long will that be? Two converging lines must sooner or later meet, and the period of time in which they will meet depends upon the velocity by which they are continued and the degree of their convergence. A glance at our population statistics shows that from 1890 to 1900 we increased 21 per cent. From 1900 to 1910 we increased 21 per cent. We may naturally assume that we will increase in the next 10 years at the same rate. This would be an increase of 2.1 per cent per year. The population in 1910 was, in round numbers, 92,000,000. Ninety-two million from 107,000,000 leaves 15,000,000. Two and one-tenth per cent of 92,000,000 is 1,932,000, the increase in one year. Dividing 15,000,000 by this average yearly increase, we have eight years. Therefore, at the present rate of increase in population and with an increase of our wheat production up to an average of 700,000,000, consumption and production will equal each other in 1918, or seven years hence.

In the year 1918, then, your crop will sell for the world's price, plus the tariff. If your tariff is 25 cents a bushel on wheat, you will receive 25 cents a bushel more than the world's price, and so of flax and barley, unless there should be a shortage in the world's supply. But if the tariff wall is broken down between this country and Canada the enormous Canadian surplus will certainly bring your production to the level of the world's price.

There, however, will be no danger of any food famine, because, first, there will be hundreds of millions of bushels on our border line seeking admission; and, second, whenever the price of our product will justify the expense of more intensive farming we can for a century at least keep up with our increasing home demand.

So, Mr. President, even though we were receiving no benefit from our present protective duties the future welfare of the farmers of wheat, barley, oats, and flax demands the maintenance of the present protective law. That, Mr. President, is what I have been praying for. I hoped to live to see the day when production of wheat in this country might be a little less than the home demand, just sufficiently less to give the farmer the full benefit of protection. I know that when that time arrives the farmer will be receiving a price for his product that will give him for his labor a value greater than he has ever received before, a value that will place him on a more equal earning plane with his brothers of the city.

This has been my doctrine, this has been my hope, this is what I have preached to the farmers of the Northwest, and as a representative of the farmer constituency, believing in the correctness of my doctrine and holding the convictions which I do, that the compensation for farm labor should be materially raised and not lowered, my moral duty is to vote against this treaty.

Even if we admitted that the American market is now no better than the Canadian market, still we must answer that as soon as consumption overtakes production in this country we will reap an advantage, and that advantage is what we have earned and what we have been promised as a compensation for our sacrifices for the general principle of protection during the last 40 years.

But, Mr. President, we are to-day and have for several years been receiving better prices in the Northwest for our cereals because of the protection accorded us.

And I come now directly to the question: Does the present tariff secure to the American farmer a price for his products greater than that which the Canadian receives, and greater than what he would receive without the duty, or is his price fixed by the export value of his product? Is it the home demand or the foreign demand that governs his values?

Mr. President, let me give one rule governing commercial values which I believe is most comprehensive and most nearly correct. That is this: The general level of the value of staple products, the common necessaries of life, is governed by the world's supply and demand. But whether prices are above or below that level in particular sections of the world depends on many extraneous conditions, such as local supply and demand, freight, course of trade, and character of the particular staple produced. This general level of wheat prices, for instance, is not fixed by Liverpool, Hamburg, or Chicago. If the world's supply shows an overabundance it depresses the price everywhere. If there is a world's shortage every market in the world responds in a higher general level of prices.

But while this world's supply and demand affects the general level of values, it does not bring every market on the same level. If the demand in a particular section is greater than the product in that section its prices will be above the world's level of prices.

Mr. President, the error of many men who discuss this question is that they fail to take into consideration those secondary influences which often are of more value than the primary cause of supply and need.

When they consider the subject of wheat, they will say to us: We raised this year, say, 650,000,000 bushels of wheat; we need for home consumption 600,000,000 bushels; we therefore must export 50,000,000 bushels; and if that 50,000,000 bushels must compete with the world's markets, it fixes the price of the whole of the product of this year. With this simple and academic course of reasoning they close their investigation and refuse to be convinced of their error.

Let me illustrate how easily their philosophy may be shattered. In their mind's eye they see a great bin of American wheat holding 50,000,000 bushels, designated surplus. They never stop to ask where this bin is located, whether it is at New Orleans, San Francisco, or Minneapolis; they never ask what particular kind of grain makes up the bulk of this surplus; they never ask in what particular section is the bulk of this grain raised; they never ask where is the field of consumption for this particular kind of grain; they never stop to figure out whether the surplus of one kind of wheat raised in one particular section will affect the price of another kind of wheat raised in another section; they lose sight of the size of their country, and the particular territory which produces certain kinds of grain. It never occurs to them that there may be an insufficient supply of No. 1 northern wheat to meet the milling demand of one section and that the millers must mix all they dare of a softer wheat from another section to supply this deficiency; it never occurs to them that this 50,000,000 bushels of surplus is not in one bin located at one point, but in several large bins located hundreds and even thousands of miles apart, and also many smaller bins, each holding its particular species or grade of grain and representing the special product of a particular section with outlet only at a particular port; it never occurs to them that one bin may be located at San Francisco with its particular kind of soft wheat, one at Minneapolis with its No. 1 northern wheat, one at Chicago with its winter red, one at New Orleans with its turkey red. It never occurs to them that the course of transportation may prevent the surplus of one section being used to supply the deficiency of another section, and yet, Mr. President, every one of these factors must be considered in determining the effect of that surplus in different markets.

Now, suppose the San Francisco bin, which holds the surplus of what may be designated San Francisco territory, is full to overflowing and the Minneapolis surplus bin is empty, as it has been for about 10 years or more. Minneapolis can not get San Francisco wheat. Freight rates would amount to a prohibition. Nor would Minneapolis take San Francisco wheat if she could get it. It would not answer her milling purposes. She could not depend on the Chicago bin for it, because she can only use a certain per cent of the kind of wheat in the Chicago bin for the grade of flour which she must make to maintain the standard of her product, a standard that has given her fame and wealth. The New Orleans bin, like the San Francisco bin, is out of the question, because of both the character of grain and freight rates. Thus you will see that while each one of those last-mentioned bins might have a discharge spout leading to some port of exportation, the Minneapolis consumptive demand might have for exportation none of the grain raised in Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, parts of Iowa, Wisconsin, and Montana which she needs for milling purposes; and all of the grain raised in these States might have a value fixed by the home demand; and that demand might lift the price considerably above the price in Canada or in any other section which was obliged to seek the open world's field with its surplus.

Now, let me bring this theory home to you in concrete facts and figures.

I have here a table of comparative prices of the same grade of grain in Winnipeg and Minneapolis. Winnipeg quotations, which all grain men know to mean the price at elevators at Port Arthur and Fort William, are taken from the market reports at Winnipeg, and the Minneapolis quotations from the reports at Minneapolis. They have the same grade of grain, No. 1 northern, in both cities. But if you will examine into the requirements of the Winnipeg and Minneapolis grades of No. 1 northern you will see that Canadian No. 2 northern approximates our American No. 1. For instance, Canadian No. 1 northern requires 60 pounds to the bushel, Minneapolis No. 1 northern requires 58 pounds to the bushel, Winnipeg No. 2 requires 58 pounds to the bushel; and as there are generally about 3 cents spread between the No. 1 and No. 2 grades, you would obtain a closer comparative price if you would add 3 cents more to each bushel at Minneapolis as you go through this table. But as this is not generally known or understood, we use No. 1 northern as the basis of comparison in each instance.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want Senators to understand that I have given here the last Saturday of every month in every year for the years 1909, 1910, and a part of 1911, and that on every one of those dates throughout all of the time we could not have exported to Europe from the northern part of this country one bushel of grain of the kind that is enumerated in this table.

I start with July 10, 1909, when prices were nearly the same. The price in Winnipeg was $1.31⅞ and in Minneapolis only $1.30⅝. There was then an advantage in Winnipeg of a cent and a quarter a bushel. But that was due to speculation and a sort of cornering of the market. It immediately went down to its normal condition, and when we get along as far as July 31 the price was $1.19 in Winnipeg and $1.32 in Minneapolis; the next week, August 9, $1.12 in Winnipeg and $1.28 in Minneapolis—16 cents difference; August 14, $1.10 in Winnipeg and $1.43 in Minneapolis—33 cents difference.

Here was the same cause—speculation in the Minneapolis markets for a few days. The bulls had the better of it and forced the price of wheat up to much beyond the average difference between Minneapolis and Winnipeg.

Why is this great difference between Minneapolis and Fort William and Port Arthur prices? To reach water transportation Minneapolis grain must be shipped to Duluth. So far as transportation is concerned to European countries, Port Arthur and Duluth are situated about the same. The cost of transportation to European countries is practically the same, and yet Minneapolis and Duluth both pay uniformly higher prices than Winnipeg pays for grain of the same grade. This is not due to speculation or any great fluctuation caused thereby, because, as you will observe, the spread between the two places has for years been growing wider, and if you will look carefully you will note that our prices advance about in proportion as our general exports decline.

And there must be some trade condition which gives the American farmer better prices for his grade. If you will investigate this subject still further, you will find that Minneapolis has practically ceased to export our commercial grade. The testimony of Mr. Wilkins, from Minnesota, was to the effect that for about 12 or 15 years Minneapolis has not been exporting at all. Yet this is the greatest wheat market in the United States.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator might add in that connection that Duluth for years has not exported any wheat to Europe.

Mr. McCUMBER. Not anything except a little macaroni and the poorest grades.

I tried to find out through Minneapolis wheat firms the cost of transportation from Minneapolis to Liverpool. I was surprised to find not one of the principal grain firms could give me the information. One firm which was also doing business in Duluth and which exported some grain—I think this was mostly macaroni or the lower grades of grain—was able to give me the approximate cost of transportation. But why is it that Minneapolis is not exporting and has not been exporting grain? There is just one answer. Because she has had to pay such prices in order to get the grain she needed for her flour mills that she has remained above an export basis. She is manufacturing a grade of flour for her American as well as her export business which she must maintain at her high standard of perfection. She must have all of the wheat of a certain kind raised in that section of the country for that purpose. In fact, she must have more than what is raised in the Minneapolis territory for that purpose, and she must therefore reach farther South and get another kind of grain which she can mix, sometimes as high as 30 per cent, I am informed, with her northern wheat without reducing the standard of her flour. Some of you still insist that Liverpool fixes our price. I have here another table, which I procured from the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Agriculture, giving the range of cash price per bushel of No. 1 northern during each month of the years 1908, 1909, and 1910 in Minneapolis and Liverpool.

I am informed, and I think correctly, that the transportation from Minneapolis to Liverpool, including insurance, handling, and so forth, is from 15 to 16 cents per bushel; and as people are not engaged in buying and selling wheat for amusement, you can properly assume that the wheat would not be shipped from Minneapolis to Liverpool unless the dealer receives from 1 to 2 cents per bushel profit upon his risk and investment. Therefore, in order to be on an exporting basis, Minneapolis prices would have to be about 17 cents lower than Liverpool prices. If you will inspect the table, you will observe, taking averages, that during the year 1908 the average price of No. 1 northern in Minneapolis was $1.11; the average price in Liverpool was $1.25, or 14 cents difference—less than enough to pay the expense of transportation, and so forth. You will also find that the average price of No. 1 northern in Minneapolis in 1909 was $1.20, while the average price in Liverpool was only $1.29, a difference of only 9 cents. You will also find from the same table that the average price of No. 1 northern in Minneapolis during 1910 was $1.14, and the average price in Liverpool was $1.14, exactly the same in Minneapolis as in Liverpool; and yet some of you keep on insisting that Liverpool fixes our prices. There was not a single day, Mr. President, in those three years that Minneapolis could have shipped this grade of grain to Liverpool.

I will ask leave to introduce this table, from which Senators can see every month the average in both of those great markets.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request is granted.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, if you will compare this table with the previous table referred to, you will find about the same relation between Minneapolis and Liverpool prices that you find between Minneapolis and Port Arthur. It demonstrates conclusively that while Port Arthur must pay for her grain Liverpool prices, less transportation, insurance commissions, profits, and so forth, because of her very heavy exports, Minneapolis does not pay for grain on the basis of an export price, but on the basis of home consumption and demand.

I might add that Chicago for most of the year is in exactly the same condition.

Now, Mr. President, if you will look further into this question of northwestern products, her home consumption and her exportation, you will again find evidence of the importance of home consumption. We do raise a wheat in that section which we are compelled to export, namely, macaroni. The demand of this country for macaroni wheat is not large. I am informed that this wheat is nearly all exported. It must therefore sell on an export basis. And I have known the difference in price between that kind of wheat and No. 1 northern to run from 15 cents to 30 cents per bushel. The value of macaroni was fixed by the foreign demand; the value of No. 1 northern was fixed by the home demand. That is why our northwestern farmers are receiving a price for their product very much in excess of the value of the Canadian product.

Now, does this benefit of higher prices accrue to the other wheat raisers in the country, or is it limited to the wheat raisers of the Northwestern States?

Mr. President, the application of this same law of supply and demand will answer this question. Using the bin illustration again: The price of the Chicago grain will be higher or lower than what we call the world's level in prices just to the extent that her surplus bin is full to overflowing, partially full, or empty. Prices will be depressed or enlivened according to whether the supply of grain in that market is great, medium, or below the demand. Well, then, supposing there is a surplus in the Chicago bin. Will it not follow that any condition which will reduce that surplus will enhance its value? What is one of the principal factors that will reduce that surplus? It is the demand of the Minneapolis mills for more wheat than their territory will supply—that is, for more wheat of the kind they can use for their standard of flour. Durum wheat, for instance, can not be used. But the millers can use a percentage of other grades of grain. Nearly every year Minneapolis draws from the Chicago territory some wheat which can be mixed with northern wheat. This lowers the surplus; this enhances the value of all of the grain in the Chicago territory. If the Minneapolis millers could get this No. 1 northern wheat or No. 1 hard wheat free from Canada, which is within her territory, do you suppose for a moment she would go into the Chicago territory for a grain which she dare not use beyond a certain percentage? Thus not only are the border State farmers benefited, but every other grain State is to some extent benefited by a maintenance of the tariff law; and all would suffer, but not in the same degree, if that wall is leveled.

Every farmer knows the depressing price on wheat when there is an enormous corn surplus, and every corn producer understands the depressing price on corn when there is an enormous wheat surplus. You can not injure one of these industries without to some extent injuring the other industries.

ACCOUNTING FOR DIFFERENCES IN GRAIN PRICES.

Finding these American prices so universally and persistently higher on the American than on the Canadian side, those Senators and others who feel the need of some plausible excuse for voting for a proposition which will bring all those prices to the same level have sought in every way to demonstrate that these differences were due to some other cause than protection. They have tried to show that there were equivalent differences between the prices of wheat in our own different grain markets. They have failed in every instance. When investigated it would be found that these differences in our own markets were transitory and that they were due either to erroneous comparison of different kinds of grain or to speculation, the temporary cornering or overloading of markets or a difference in freight rates between those markets, whereas the difference between the Canadian and American markets was permanent, and towns on the two sides of the border line situated the same, with rates of transportation to the seaboard the same, showed from 10 to 15 cents a bushel on wheat, from 20 to 30 cents a bushel on barley, and from 25 to 30 cents a bushel on flax, in favor of the American farmer, and that other great wheat centers having exactly the same facilities to reach foreign markets showed the same advantage to the American farmer.

I will again use a table which I used in a previous discussion on the subject. This is a new Congress, with many new Senators. After this reciprocity treaty had been made public I wired to obtain the prices of grain on both sides of the border line between Canada and North Dakota, in towns where freight rates would be the same. I will have printed here a table showing the prices on wheat and barley, so far as I received them, in those towns, showing their location and the distance between them. Now, what was shown in reference to these prices on the dates mentioned in this table has been substantially true for a good many years.

Do	do	St. John	.66

To understand this table I call attention to the map on the wall. You will see there the Great Northern line in red in the northern parts of the States of Minnesota, North Dakota, and Montana. You will see the great number of feeders running up to the Canadian line on the North Dakota side, with little towns marked in black. You will see the Canadian Pacific Railroad paralleling the northern part of the line, with little Canadian towns marked in red coloring. You will notice one town exactly on the line, which is Portal and North Portal, that is divided only by a street, with the British flag flying on one side and the American flag flying upon the other.

The freight rates at those points on the Canadian Pacific and on the American side are the same. They are within the same territory, and the grain from one can be brought in bond across the American Continent exactly the same as the other and without the payment of any tariff. But that which you bring in bond you have got to export. That which you do not bring in bond you can sell in this country, and that which you do not have to export you sell at from 10 to 15 cents on wheat and from 20 to 30 cents on barley and from 25 to 30 cents on flax higher than that which you are compelled to export.

Now, I will just call attention to a few of these differences. I will take Kermit wheat. That is in the United States. The price is 90 cents a bushel. At Estevan the price is 76 cents a bushel. The towns are 15 miles apart and there is a difference of 14 cents. I will take the next one—Pembina, United States—price, 97 cents. At Emerson, Manitoba, 4 miles from there, 82 cents, a difference of 15 cents a bushel. I will take Portal, American side, 90 cents; North Portal, on the Canadian side, 75 cents; a difference of 15 cents a bushel and only across the line.

There is no use in running through all these figures, because you can get the information from the table, but you will find that there is, on an average, a difference of about 14 cents a bushel on wheat. I will just quote one or two on barley. Pembina, 67 cents; Emerson, 42 cents; a difference of 25 cents a bushel in our favor and only 4 miles apart. Neche, 66 cents; Gretna, 38 cents; only 2 miles apart and a difference of 28 cents a bushel in our favor.

What is true of the difference in prices of substantially the same grade of grain between the little towns on the border line of North Dakota and Canada is equally true of the difference in prices at the great terminals in Canada and in the United States, as I have shown by the first table which I discussed.

If you look further on the map there you will see Duluth on the lake on the United States side and Port Arthur, or Fort William, I do not remember which, because they are close together, on the northern side of the lake. Both of them can send their grain through the same canal, and at exactly the same rate, to the Old World.

The reports contained in that table dealt with cash prices—the sale of actual wheat and not the sale of futures. I understand that other tables have been published differing from these. I have not read it, but I understand the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] introduced a table that did not agree with these. Such other tables, I think, do not refer to cash wheat, but to wheat for future deliveries. They are simply speculative. The price of the cash wheat is the basis on which the farmer is paid. To illustrate: On April 16, 1911, Minneapolis May closed at 97½ cents; Winnipeg May closed at 93⅝ cents, a difference of 3⅞ cents; but the best No. 1 northern cash wheat in Minneapolis closed at $1.01, while the same wheat closed in Winnipeg at 92½ cents, a difference of 8½ cents. I call special attention to this, so that you will not be misled by quotations on futures or gambling contracts, as most of them are. This shows absolutely what we contend—that the home demand in this country causes the miller to bid up to get the cash wheat, while the home demand in Canada or any country whose surplus is so large that it must be sold abroad will place cash wheat at a discount under the future equal to the cost of storage, interest, and insurance (except where the future is a new-crop option). So if we always base our figures on the cash No. 1 northern wheat in the two markets, we will get the real difference to the farmer.

This table showing the marked advantage of the American over the Canadian market can not be explained away on any possible hypothesis other than that of the protection accorded under present tariff law. The table which I heretofore introduced showing the comparative prices between Minneapolis and Liverpool explains the whole thing. For three years we have not been on an exporting basis. I have reference to the Minneapolis and northwestern market, which I have termed the Minneapolis territory.

Mr. President, the insistence of those who have not or will not investigate the real cause of the difference between American and Canadian prices on grain, that we either do not have that difference or that it is due to some other cause, justifies me in quoting some of the testimony introduced in the hearings of the Finance Committee on this subject.

Mr. Lyon, of South Dakota, says:

For more than five years past the price of northern wheat at Minneapolis has averaged from 5 to 15 cents per bushel more than at Winnipeg. The price at Winnipeg, as you all know, is based upon delivery at Fort William port. From July 10, 1909, to January 28, 1911, the price of northern wheat at Minneapolis averaged 10¼ cents per bushel more than at Winnipeg.

That is practically the same as shown by the figures which I have given, if you will add them up; I make it 10⅛ cents, while he calls it 10¼ cents.

The expense of shipment from Minneapolis to Duluth is approximately 1⅛ cents per bushel, thus making a difference of about 12 cents per bushel between the prices at Duluth and Fort William, on opposite sides of the international line at the head of Lake Superior, and with equal freights to Liverpool. Can anything show more clearly that the price of our wheat is not determined by the Liverpool market, as has been repeatedly stated by the President? Not only that, but the Winnipeg grade is higher and the weight 2 pounds greater per bushel, and by reason of its better quality and higher grade the Winnipeg wheat sells at from 3 to 5 cents per bushel higher than our northern wheat whenever they meet in the same market—

But from 10 to 15 cents a bushel when they meet in the American market—

There was therefore an average actual difference in the price of wheat for the 18 months immediately preceding the negotiation of this treaty of more than 15 cents a bushel in favor of the American farmer. The average price paid for barley at Portal, N. Dak., on January 9 and 10, 1911, was 63 cents; at North Portal, just over the Canadian line, the price was 35 cents a bushel, a difference in our favor of 28 cents a bushel. At the same time there was an average difference in our favor of about 25 cents a bushel in the price of flax.

Mr. Lyon, of South Dakota, says further:

With oats we have at present little if any advantage in the price, for the reason that our yield last year was about 125,000,000 bushels greater than the year before, thus making it necessary to export a considerable portion of our crop and thereby necessarily reducing the price to the world's level. In 1900, for a considerable portion of the year, our price of oats averaged considerably higher than the Canadian price, and more than 900,000 bushels were imported from Canada, paying a duty of 15 cents a bushel.

Mr. Wilkinson, of Minnesota, says:

This idea of Liverpool controlling the market has gone out of date in the last few years and we have got a market of our own that we have built up for ourselves, and now we are trying to defend it. The fact is that the wheat for the last five years, though the contrast has been greater in the latter three years, has averaged from 5 to 15 cents a bushel more in Duluth than in Winnipeg.

And, further, he says:

The better grade of wheat has to bring up the lower price at the other side of the line, because their market is the export market of Great Britain; our wheat not being quite as good, but worth intrinsically from 3 to 4 cents per bushel less, will sell from 5 to 15 cents per bushel more on this side of the line at practically the same market points, with practically the same facilities to get it to the markets of the country as the other, because we have built up that home market for our products. That is the reason our northwestern wheat is worth to us more money than it is in Liverpool.

Again, he says:

I make this statement, and I want to be clearly understood, that the value of the wheat of Canada, at Port Arthur, has been based on what it would bring on the British market in Liverpool. I make this further statement, that the Duluth market has averaged from 5 to 15 cents per bushel during that five years more for our No. 1 northern at Duluth than the Canadian No. 1 northern has brought at Port Arthur. You can not get away from that fact.

He further says:

These facts themselves prove that we have in the Northwestern States a home market for our wheat, and we claim that it is because the system of protection has built up the factories of this country, enlarged the manufacturing industries, enlarged its consuming capacity, and that we look for that home market in helping you to build up and maintain the system of protection.

Mr. Devine, of North Dakota, in his testimony says:

Flax was sold at Portal during the month of December, on the Canadian side, at $1.89; on the American side at $2.34. I might say now, because Portal is a town just beyond where I live, that my barley on the Canadian side sold for 33 cents for that month. On the American side it sold for 65 cents—32 cents difference. Wheat for that month of this year sold on the Canadian side for 74 cents; on the American side for 99 cents—25 cents difference.

Mr. Kingman, of North Dakota, says:

It is a fact that we have had and are having to-day a premium on our wheat over Canadian wheat of approximately 10 cents a bushel. It has been lower than that in the last six or seven years, and it has been higher, but our wheat has averaged in the last six or seven years about 10 cents over the Canadian price.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I would like to ask the Senator whether it happens sometimes that the price of wheat in Minneapolis is higher than the price of wheat in Chicago?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, yes.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. How does the Senator account for that?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator has not been here all the time that I have been discussing that question, and I have gone thoroughly into it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have listened to the Senator's argument to the effect that the tariff is responsible for the fact that Minneapolis wheat is higher than wheat across the line in Canada. Now, I should like to ask him how he accounts for the fact that wheat in Minneapolis is frequently higher than it is in Chicago under the same tariff?

Mr. McCUMBER. I discussed that question, spending nearly an hour on it; but I will state again that prices fluctuate according to speculation and according to the surplus that happens to be in each section of the United States. A certain section of the United States may have within its territory a surplus of grain above its consumptive demand which must go to the foreign market. Another section of the country may not have a surplus, but a deficiency of what is necessary in its own section, and therefore may bid up. Minneapolis is a great home-demand section. She needs more wheat than she can get of the grade that she uses for milling in her territory. She can not go into San Francisco territory on account of freight rates; she can not go into what might be denominated St. Louis or New Orleans territory, both on account of freight rates and on account of the kind of grain that they raise down there. She may go into a portion of the Chicago territory and draw from that, to some extent, at certain times, and that will send the Chicago price up. If she does not go into that territory, the Chicago prices may be down; but, independent of that, comes great speculation, which will corner the market and send it up at one time in one section and then in another, and then overload and drive it down. What I have been speaking about has been the general course of cash wheat—not speculative wheat—at the great markets, day in and day out, and I have shown the general condition of a much higher price, even in Chicago, and a still greater price in Duluth and Minneapolis than in any of the territory of Canada.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So that when the farmer is compelled to accept 93 cents for his wheat in Chicago whereas he might receive $1.07 for his wheat in Minneapolis, that difference is not due to the tariff, and, if that difference is not due to the tariff, why is the difference between the price in Minneapolis and at some point in Canada due to the tariff?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator has got the wrong table. I think, first, he will find it is not the same grade of wheat, and that makes all the difference in the world.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have here the figures.

Mr. McCUMBER. As I have stated in the discussion of this matter, you have got to consider the kind of grain in the several markets. I am not saying the Senator has not any table, but you have got to take the same kind of grain, and I have seen one table which dealt with an entirely different kind of grain. Chicago grade No. 2 red has no relation whatever to Minneapolis grade No. 2 northern. They sell for different purposes; they are used for the manufacture of different kinds of flour. One is exported and the other is not exported.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Do those two cities deal in the same kind of wheat?

Mr. McCUMBER. On the whole, I will say no. There is very little of what we call No. 2 northern that goes into the Chicago market, but it is not enough to be taken into consideration.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me ask the Senator whether Canada deals in the same wheat that Chicago does?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; Canada has the same kind that Minneapolis has.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then the tariff is being adjusted simply for the benefit of farmers who deal on the Minneapolis market?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator was not present when I showed that Chicago got a benefit as well as other places. If I felt that I would be justified in going over my remarks again, I would convince the Senator of the truth of the statement that when the markets go up in one section of the country, in Minneapolis for instance, and on account of a scarcity of No. 1 northern wheat, she has got to reach down into the Chicago territory and take a whole lot of Chicago grain that otherwise would have to go into a foreign market. By reducing the surplus in the Chicago market she necessarily raises the price in the Chicago market because of the commercial rule that the smaller the surplus the greater the price per unit.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. She would not go to Chicago if she could go to Canada.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; she would not go to Chicago if she could go to Canada for two reasons, first, Canada is in what may be called Minneapolis territory, and, second, Canada has the particular kind of grain Minneapolis requires for her flour, and Chicago has not the kind of grain she prefers.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I want to see if I understand the Senator from North Dakota correctly. Do I understand him to say that he has been preaching to the farmers for years that they have not received their share of the country's prosperity?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator has understood me correctly.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, then, I want to ask the Senator in all seriousness whose fault was it? Was there not in vogue in North Dakota and in the country at large a policy of Republican protective tariff? If protective tariff was the thing to elevate mankind to prosperity and happiness, then, pray God, why is it that the farmers have not received it?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will tell the Senator why. It was simply because we had more land, more acres to seed and raised more crops than the American people could consume, and we had to sell our products abroad in competition with the world's supply.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, then——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. That is only half of it. We increased the home consumption, and we reduced the surplus, just as the protective tariff gave a better demand for our manufactured products at home, just as it builded up our cities and increased the consuming public in this country. Therefore the two go hand in hand. I say to the farmers, first, the price of your grain is, under the ordinary conditions of a great surplus, fixed by the foreign demand. Reduce that surplus by any economic condition and it will increase the price. That is so complete an answer, Mr. President, that I do not need to go over it again.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have only to say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey will please address the Chair. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield further?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I have only to say that that specious argument has failed to put bread in the mouths of the people. I insist, sir, that continuously that has been the argument of Republican politicians on the stump. Where it was needed their argument was that high prices would advance the farmers' welfare, and where it was thought that low prices were desirable, your same policy of protection has been advanced. The farmers have listened long years to the specious theories of the distinguished Senator. We admit with you that we have not had our share of prosperity; we have tried your remedy, and it has failed; and so we are unwilling to believe to-day that a process of taxation will make us better off. The hateful and horrid and dishonest policy——

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not yield for a speech.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Of trying to make the farmer and the average citizen believe that he may grow rich by taxing himself is too fallacious to be listened to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Ah, Mr. President, the Senator will never make the farmer believe that fallacious talk. You gave us a dose of your doctrine from 1894 to 1897. The farmer got his lesson, Mr. President, and he does not want another lesson of that kind.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Let me say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey will please address the chair.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield to the Senator from New Jersey to make his argument when I get through. I will yield now for any question, but not for the purpose of argument.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will have the opportunity then anyway.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield for any question, but not for an argument.

Our farmers have been getting the benefit of their protection in the last three or four years. They did not get the benefit of it during the years 1894 to 1897. Instead they then got the benefit of a nearly free-trade doctrine. And they got all they wanted of it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Will the Senator answer me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield for a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. When the Senator says the benefit, I desire to ask him how it is, if the farmers were so benefited, that throughout the great eastern section of these United States we know to-day of abandoned farms under your protective policy?

Mr. McCUMBER. That has been answered several times here.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, it will bear answering again.

Mr. McCUMBER. The only difference is that the Senator now wants us to abandon the rest of our farms and go over into Canada and develop theirs, and we will not do it until we are compelled to.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. That is not answering the question.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will go on with the testimony of Mr. Twitchell.

I first want to establish the fact that we are getting a benefit, and I will establish it even at the expense of being tedious, so that no Senator can get around the fact that we are being protected.

Mr. Twitchell, of North Dakota, says:

So far as the barley crop is concerned, since we have sufficient protection on the barley to give the American market to its farmer, we have been able to raise in Wisconsin, Minnesota, Idaho, North and South Dakota approximately 100,000,000 bushels of barley. This year the American farmer has been receiving approximately the difference in the tariff of about 27 cents. We have been able to get for barley for the last five or six years, in my judgment, possibly 15 cents a bushel more than we would if we had competition with Canada.

Now, Mr. President, I want to close the argument on this one proposition.

EVIDENCE OF GRAIN EXCHANGES.

Mr. President, the supporters of the Canadian reciprocity agreement may flounder as much as they see fit in their sea of trouble around this eternal rock of fact that our tariff duties give us the protection which we claim upon the northwestern cereals. There are few men, indeed, who know the grain business at the great terminals better than those who have for many years been engaged in it. And if we wanted any further evidence of the fact that the present protective tariffs do give us a very material protection and very materially enhances the value of our wheat, barley, and flax than the daily reports of those great grain markets in both the United States and Canada, we shall find cumulative evidence in the reports from the exchanges as to the reasons for any sudden decline or advance in prices. In my previous address on this subject I called attention to the influence of this agreement and the possibilities of its adoption in depressing our prices. I want again to impress that fact on the Senate.

On the 7th day of January there was 14 cents difference between Winnipeg and Minneapolis closing prices. On the 14th there was a difference of 13 cents in our favor. On the 28th, after we had a report of the effect of this reciprocity agreement and its likelihood to pass that Congress, Winnipeg grain went up 1½ cents and Minneapolis grain went down 5 cents. So the single fact that this agreement had been reported to the Congress of the United States reduced the price of our wheat 5 cents per bushel and increased Winnipeg 1½ cents.

Let us read the exchange reports and see if this reported agreement was the real and only cause for this decline and the general decline in our prices since it was reported.

This is very important to anyone who is conscientiously trying to get the truth of the affair.

The report of February 11, 1911, from the Minneapolis Chamber of Commerce, published in the Minneapolis Journal, says:

The bottom broke out of the wheat market late this week, and prices suffered the worst decline in several months. Early prices registered moderate declines, and this was followed by a moderate reaction. Both May and July closed Saturday below the dollar mark. This severe break was caused principally by the developments favorable to the adoption of reciprocity with Canada.

Mr. President, those people who are buying and selling wheat know that the difference between the Canadian and the United States prices is nothing more or less than a difference caused by the tariff duties, and they know if we strike off those duties the value of all our wheat must come down; and, anticipating that the agreement was likely to become a law, prices did go down.

Again, the same report says:

On Friday and Saturday prices suffered the sharpest break in several weeks. May sold down to 98⅝ cents, the lowest price for this contract since August, 1909. The near month fluctuated in a range of 4⅛ cents for the week, and the same contract in Chicago showed a difference of 5⅜ cents. It was thought that reciprocity with Canada would have a more depressing effect on the price of Minneapolis wheat than Chicago, because of the geographic situation. The price fluctuations of this week seemed to confirm this theory.

Why does it affect Minneapolis more than Chicago? Because the Canadian wheat is within the Minneapolis territory. Minneapolis would be its natural market. It would come over and glut the Minneapolis market before any of it would go into the Chicago market. That is why it affected Minneapolis more than Chicago.

Again, the same publication says:

European countries are being offered wheat at prices that would not be profitable for Americans to export. The decline of this week has put the United States nearer an export basis, but still further declines will be necessary to allow this country to enter the European market with any profit.

Have those chamber of commerce reports no evidential force to those Senators who are still talking about Liverpool prices fixing American prices? In our sections of the country grain prices must decline still more before we can enter the European markets.

Again, the same dispatch says:

Many of the local trade were predicting that domestic prices would decline until this country was on an export basis.

If that does not mean that this country was not on an export basis for the kind of grain we raise in the Northwest, then I am at a loss to understand what it does mean.

Has the possibility or probability of Canadian reciprocity affected the price of our barley?

Berger Crittendon Co., commission men of Milwaukee, speaking of barley in the early part of February, in their reports say:

The market was dull as ever, with only a few cars of Wisconsin sold. Outside of this a few cars of Minnesota were sold, whereas all the other cars carried over for the last three or four days were again carried over to-day, maltsters and brewers still holding back. We naturally have to await developments.

What developments? Why, the developments of the Canadian reciprocity agreement.

Here is another, from Mohr-Holstein Commission Co., of Milwaukee:

Our market is perfectly lifeless—nothing doing. Not many of our maltsters would make a bid on anything to-day. It certainly does not look at all encouraging to us. The trade here feels bearish on account of the reciprocity treaty with Canada. It is very evident that the brewers are in a waiting mood and that purchases of malt are confined to what is absolutely necessary to carry on business. The uncertainty which exists in the mind of the trade in regard to the Canadian reciprocity treaty and the possibility of its ratification has created a bearish sentiment, and the trade in general is disposed to await further development before supporting the market with buying orders.

On February 9 barley was selling at 49 cents in Winnipeg; top grades in Minneapolis and Duluth, 84 cents; Chicago and Milwaukee, 86 cents. With that difference between Winnipeg, Minneapolis, Duluth, and Milwaukee, is it any wonder that maltsters and brewers were awaiting the fate of the reciprocity agreement before touching the American barley and that they were using only what they were compelled to use? And can there be any question in the mind of any sane man that with our tariff taken off our prices would be naturally lower?

Here is another article, printed in the Minneapolis Journal in its report from the grain exchange the day after Congress adjourned last session without passing the reciprocity agreement:

This becomes most important. The previous articles showed that prices declined because of the prospect of the reciprocity bill passing at the last session of Congress. This one shows that prices rebounded as soon as Congress adjourned without passing the reciprocity agreement. Here is the quotation—and remember this is from the exchanges and gives their sentiments and reasons:

Wheat prices soared up to heights to-day that the market has not seen in over two weeks. The advantage in the near month of 2¾ and 2¾ cents was the biggest upward daily jump wheat has taken in months. The adjournment of the United States Senate without acting on the McCall bill was the cause of the sharp advance. The market declined 15½ cents, largely on the prospects that the reciprocity treaty might be adopted.

Think of this, Senators. This is from your exchanges. Since we proclaimed this reciprocity agreement our wheat has declined on an average 15½ cents a bushel. Do you know what that means to the Northwest? North Dakota, Minnesota, and South Dakota have raised in a single year for sale about 200,000,000 bushels of wheat. What does 15 cents a bushel on the wheat that they would sell mean? It means $30,000,000 loss to those three States in a single year; and yet you are telling us that we will not suffer any by putting our price down to the Canadian price.

Proceeding further with this:

Now that this bill is temporarily disposed of—

I am quoting now from the exchange—

Now that this bill is temporarily disposed of, it was only natural that wheat should take a sharp upturn. The local mills were good buyers of wheat in the pit, and the firmer cash market made the future strong also. Shorts were forced to cover and there was some speculative buying on the news from Washington.

That is published in a paper day after day in Minneapolis, which is booming reciprocity and yet showing to its readers by every publication the loss that the people of Minnesota and North and South Dakota will suffer by reason of this reciprocity agreement.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. I desire to ask a question in the best of faith.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know the Senator would ask it in no other way.

Mr. KENYON. In the reduction of prices, as the Senator has stated, was there any reduction in the price of flour, of breadstuffs?

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that there has been a very trifling reduction, but none in breadstuffs.

In the face of the indisputable evidence of figures and the reports from the floor of the grain exchanges, can any man honestly deny that this reciprocity agreement, if enacted into law, will materially reduce our grain value?

Mr. President, I do not think there is a single person who has heard or read the testimony who will not agree that the present rates of tariff have been a great protection to the agricultural producers of the Northwest. And if they vote to support this measure they must justify themselves on some other ground than that their vote will not be an injury to all of the northwestern farmers.

BOYLE.

These conditions have remained so long and so steadfast that they could not be accounted for on theory of speculation. These comparative prices were so many irrefutable facts that protection did protect. They would not get out of the path of the reciprocity advocates who tried to show that protection did not protect. So those advocates had to at least make some effort to reconcile them with their declarations. And so they brought from my State Prof. Boyle, who, with his lance of political science, was to clear the track of argument of these disagreeable facts.

Prof. Boyle was modest. He had evidently been brought face to face with those facts before. They had confronted and confounded his philosophy, and he had not been able to explain them away even satisfactorily to himself. And he therefore admitted that his explanation for them might not quite satisfy others. But he was courageous and willing to take the chance. His argument was that several years ago the Province of Manitoba enacted a law prohibiting the dealing in grain futures. Prior to that time the dealer who purchased grain from the farmer could sell his product the same day at the price on that day, to be delivered at some future time. This enabled him to hedge against loss. It operated as an insurance against subsequent fluctuations in the market.

But when this prohibitory law was enacted and the dealer could not sell futures, in order to be perfectly safe he was compelled to pay the farmer less than he otherwise would; he was compelled to make his profits so much larger; and that this accounted for the difference of from 10 to 15 cents per bushel in the American and Canadian prices during the last two or three years.

Of course, anyone who knows anything about grain dealing could see the weakness of this argument. There were two great reasons why the argument did not prove the premises—first, because it could not account for so great a difference, if it had been true; and, second, because it was not true.

Under ordinary conditions there would be no reason for hedging. The market was just as liable to advance as to go down. By the law of chance he would break even. But, assuming that he did not want to take that chance, 1 or 2 cents a bushel in his favor would certainly have been a sufficient insurance, whereas, according to the theory of Mr. Boyle, it was necessary for him to take from 10 to 15 cents a bushel. His argument to those having even a limited knowledge of grain dealing would be its own refutation.

But Mr. Boyle's testimony and his philosophy were based upon an erroneous assumption. There has never been any law in Canada prohibiting the sale of grain to arrive. No sooner had his testimony been given than all of the witnesses from North Dakota informed me that it could not be so. But to be absolutely certain, Mr. HELGESEN, Representative from our State, wired to Winnipeg for the information, and received in response from the secretary of the grain exchange the following telegram:

WINNIPEG, MANITOBA, May 22, 1911.

H. T. HELGESEN,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.:

Country elevators here sell daily purchases as hedge as a regular thing. No law preventing it. Exchange floor business here practically same as Minneapolis.

WINNIPEG GRAIN EXCHANGE.

The testimony of Mr. Boyle, of course, was published in all the reciprocity papers as an explanation of why there was this difference between the Canadian and American markets. But when it was read in Winnipeg it called for immediate refutation.

The following editorial from the Manitoba Free Press of Saturday, May 27, does not leave even a shadow of the argument of Mr. Boyle.

I will ask the Secretary to read this editorial for me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the Manitoba Free Press, Winnipeg, Canada, Saturday, May 27, 1911.]

NOT WELL POSTED.

Prof. James D. Boyle, of the University of North Dakota, has been giving evidence before the Senate Finance Committee of the United States, at Washington, on the subject of reciprocity and the price of wheat in Winnipeg, Minneapolis, and Duluth. If all the evidence furnished by the professor is as accurate as that about the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, it will be well for the Senate committee to have it revised before use. The following is his statement on this point:

"There was good reason for the depression of prices at Winnipeg entirely apart from the question of the tariff. This reason was the passage of hostile legislation by the Manitoba Legislature. This legislation was directed against trading in futures, and it had the effect of disrupting entirely the Winnipeg Produce & Grain Exchange. It was forced out of business, and a voluntary organization known as the Winnipeg Grain Exchange took its place. Trading in futures was given up. Government elevators were also built in competition with the private ones.

"The result of these changes was that Winnipeg grain dealers could no longer pay the prices they had hitherto paid. Elevators, which had been accustomed to hedge by selling in futures against what they bought for cash, had to give up this form of insurance against loss. They had to carry the risk themselves now, whereas formerly they had been able to protect themselves against it. Naturally that risk had to be paid for. It was paid for in lower prices for wheat. The Manitoba farmer is, therefore, paying insurance against loss to the agencies that gather and ship his wheat—an insurance that was before taken care of by the device of trading in futures."

This will be news, indeed, to the members of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange. The "hostile legislation" referred to by Prof. Boyle was passed during the winter session of the Manitoba Legislature of 1908. It modified certain by-laws of the Winnipeg Grain & Produce Exchange, but no attempt was made to prohibit trading in futures. The old exchange disappeared because that was the easiest way out of the situation which was created by the passage of the legislation, and the new voluntary association was formed, the change in the name being made by dropping the word "Produce." This new exchange came into active being with the opening of the new building on the 1st of September, 1908, and the trading in futures goes on increasing year by year, until to-day it is rather more than three times as great as it was in 1908. Indeed, the grain-option market in Winnipeg is now the third largest on the continent of America, as it is the largest cash-wheat market on the continent of America. Its fluctuations are momentarily posted both in Chicago and Minneapolis, as the fluctuations of those exchanges are posted in Winnipeg. Sales are hedged as they always have been, and elevators do not carry one dollar more risk now than they did in the days before the passage of the "hostile legislation."

As to the effect of Government elevators, they are supposed to enhance, not depreciate, the price of wheat. At least that is the claim made for them by their most ardent supporters, and in any case they have only existed, partially in one Province, for one season, so they could hardly have affected prices in 1908, before they came into existence.

CANADIAN COMPETITION.

Mr. McCUMBER. Having established beyond any possible controversy that our prices are higher than the Canadian prices at the present time, and that this reciprocity agreement if enacted into law will level those prices in the immediate future to the world's level, the question arises, Will it be possible for us at any time in the future to again occupy the position we have for the last several years, that of having a home market worth from 10 to 15 cents a bushel on wheat, 25 to 30 cents a bushel on flax, and 20 to 30 cents a bushel on barley more than it would be if we were dependent upon the foreign market?

I say again that the farmer who for years has looked forward to that period when consumption and production of wheat, barley, and flax should equal each other in this country, looked forward to it with a longing hope and a steadfast faith that this protective duty would some day bring to him a measure of justice which he had not been able to secure in the past, because of his surplus production, will be doomed to remain for a century to come absolutely dependent upon and subservient to the world's level of prices for his products; and that with the enormous possibilities of grain production in the Canadian northwest those prices will be lower, comparatively, than he has received for a number of years.

Mr. President, it is impossible to get the average person to comprehend either the extent of territory or the measure of possibility of grain raising in the Canadian northwest. The figures which you will give him are so startling that he can scarcely give credence to them.

The wheat production of the world is to-day about 3,000,000,000 bushels. The northwestern Provinces of Canada have an available acreage which can be cultivated, and which, if all sowed to wheat, would yield a supply equal to the present world's production. Our annual crop is, in round numbers, about 650,000,000 bushels. That northwestern country has an acreage which, when all under cultivation, is capable of producing four and one-half times as much as the average yield of the United States.

I again do not want this to stand on my uncorroborated declaration. I propose to back up my assertions with irrefutable evidence.

The Government statistics of Canada, which are not inclined to exaggerate, give the following acreage in the three northwestern Provinces capable of cultivation and raising crops:

Provinces.	Number of acres.	Number of acres tillable land.
Manitoba	47,188,480	27,000,000
Saskatchewan	160,416,000	86,826,240
Alberta	162,000,000	100,000,000
Total	369,604,480	213,826,240

Now, let us suppose that all of this tillable land is under cultivation. The average yield of these northwestern Provinces has been about 20 bushels to the acre. Two hundred and thirteen million acres, at 20 bushels per acre, would produce 4,260,000,000 bushels.

Will all this be sown to wheat in the future? Certainly not. Why? Because there could be no demand for it in the immediate future. If you double the world's supply of wheat, the product would scarcely be worth hauling to market. The only point I am trying to make, and to make clear, is the possibility of that country and the assurance that there is a vast empire of virgin soil, capable of being opened up and made productive just as rapidly as the world's increase of population will demand its production. And I want to convince the Senate and everyone who will make a careful investigation of this subject that the effect of these possibilities, the fact that the land is there to produce this immense quantity of wheat, means that so long as it can enter free into this country in competition with our own wheat the value of our wheat can never maintain a level for any length of time in excess of the value of that grain for exporting purposes. In other words, it means that for at least a hundred years to come the farmers of our Northwestern States must remain exactly where they have been for the last hundred years, with the exception of the last decade, subject to the world's demand for their products, and that they will hereafter be denied that which they have waited so long to obtain—a really protected market for their products. Of course they will exist. Of course they will live just as they have lived, but the enactment of this law is a legislative decree depriving them of their well-earned inheritance. And, Mr. President, he who robs me of the right to inherit that which my own labors or my own sacrifices have helped to create does me as great an injustice as he who deprives me of my present possessions.

Mr. President, it is so difficult to impress the minds of those who have not had the opportunity to visit this land of wonderful potentiality with either its territorial extent or its productive capacity that I feel justified in supporting the reports of the Canadian Government with additional evidence.

Great numbers are incomprehensible. The illustration given by Prof. Chamberlain will help us to understand the extent of the productive section of this territory. He says—and I again call the attention of Senators to the map on the wall which, while it shows only a portion of the United States, will help elucidate the illustration:

Gentlemen, you can step to a map of the United States and take a pair of dividers and place one leg or one toe on Minneapolis, place the other toe at the southeastern corner of Tennessee—I say Tennessee, because Tennessee and Oklahoma, I think, are our most southern States that produced a surplus of wheat; I do not think Texas does unless within the last year or two. Now, that covers a big area. From Minneapolis to Tennessee is our entire wheat field, except a little on the coast. Now, turn it around to the Northwest and set down the leg from Tennessee, keeping the other on Minneapolis, and you have not reached the northern boundary of the wheat field by 500 miles; you have not reached their best wheat fields by 300 miles, the Peace River Valley, from the evidence we have at hand.

I again call the attention of Senators to the map. You will find on the Canadian Northern road farthest to the northwest Edmonton. I am informed they are raising good wheat and grinding it to-day 600 miles north of Edmonton, and raising it very successfully. To-day that country has not the railroads and the settlements, but it has the salubrious climate that comes from warm winds from the Japan current, and its capabilities are beyond comprehension.

I want to read a quotation—

I am still following the evidence of Mr. Chamberlain—

I want to read a quotation from George Harcourt, minister of agriculture for the Province of Alberta, in 1909. He made this report, Speaker CANNON says: "Of the country which is known, the area capable of producing grain is 220,000,000 acres."

He is referring to the three Provinces.

"Two hundred and twenty million acres. The total area in crops last year was 11,267,870 acres." Now, remember, 11,000,000 in 220,000,000 capable of being put in cultivation.

Senator MCCUMBER. One-twentieth in cultivation?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. One-twentieth, "producing a total crop of 240,000,000 bushels," says Mr. Harcourt. "The unoccupied land in the future will produce at least 5,000,000,000 bushels. This is not the end. There is a great northern country—the McKenzie Basin—which is capable of producing grain." That is taken from the Canadian Yearbook, and I want to say that those people up there, her officials, are not given to exaggerated statements, and from what I have read and from what I know, I believe that statement is absolutely correct; and I want to say, further, that two lines of railway are building into that very country at the rate of four or five hundred miles a year, bringing it within the reach of the settler and affording a market for the crop when it is produced.

Senator MCCUMBER. Now, of course, the vast proportion, or large proportion, of all this grain raised in the northwest must be exported to some country, must it not?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Up there?

Senator MCCUMBER. Yes. Canada can not take it. It has got to be exported.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It has got to be exported.

Senator MCCUMBER. Then, is not the logical and the only conclusion that, with that vast area, with its immense possibilities, coupled with the fact that its products must be exported, that it stands there as a club against the American farmer ever receiving anything more for his grain than what we call the level of the world's prices?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The only thing that will save the American farmer, if this bill becomes effective, will be that the Almighty destroys that crop; that is the only thing that can save him.

Senator MCCUMBER. Then, from 50 to 80 or 100 years it means that the farmers of the Northwest will never get the price for their products greater than the world's market?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Absolutely, Senator.

Senator MCCUMBER. And we lose the benefit of the American market, because the moment we get a price above the market of the world here is this surplus of Canada to rush in and drive it down.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir; and that surplus is so great that it will not result even in raising the price of the Canadian wheat. We come down to the Liverpool level, both of us.

Senator MCCUMBER. And then the point I wanted to make is that even though there should not be a bushel exported into this country, still the fact of its being there for export, and no tariff wall between us, would result in constantly and eternally keeping ours down?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Absolutely. It can not do anything else that I can see.

Mr. President, Mr. Laurier, in his discussion of this treaty before the Canadian Parliament, speaking of the wheat production of Canada in the near future, says:

We are sure the production will increase tenfold by and by.

He was discussing a product which was then, I believe, 166,000,000 bushels. If it is to increase tenfold by and by, you would have 1,600,000,000 bushels, or half of the world's supply. He does not claim that this tenfold is the limit of its increase.

Mr. Devine, speaking of the Canadian Northwest, says:

I want to say to you, gentlemen, that they have 200,000,000 acres of grain land—that is, oats, barley, flax, wheat, rye—and I would say to you that in no place on this continent are there 200,000,000 acres that will compare with it in its ability as a farm country. They have 145,000,000 acres of grazing and dairy land, and 105,000 people went there last year. * * * They are beginning in Canada on the highest level that we know in the West to develop it, develop it rapidly, develop it well. They will have this year to sell, in all, probably 250,000,000 bushels. Ten years ago they raised no flax; now they are raising from 5,000,000 to 7,000,000 bushels, and you take that 30 cents off and I want to tell you you are going to do a great hurt and you are going to cripple the people of the West in competition with Canada.

Mr. Kingman, of North Dakota, says:

Well, the possibilities are way beyond the conception of most men—the possibilities of the three northwestern Provinces of Canada—Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta. They have been raising an average of about 21 bushels of wheat. Their tillable area, on a basis of 15 bushels of wheat per acre, would produce an amount equal to the present world's supply of more than 3,000,000,000 bushels. It is not at all reasonable to presume that it would all be seeded to wheat, but it is a possibility. That is a rather strong statement, but I think it is true.

The following table, showing the rapid development of a single one of these Provinces, will tend to give you some idea of the competition that is in store for our northwestern farmers:

Growth of wheat production, Saskatchewan.

1909	90,215,000	105,455,000	7,833,000	4,448,700

How is that farming done in that country? Why is it that our manufacturers of farm machinery are so anxious to get the tariff taken off of their manufactured product? I will give you a little example of what I have seen up there. In the latter part of the month of May, on the broad prairies, at the time for seeding flax, I have seen an engine drawing 12 breaking plows. Behind the breaking plows were disk harrows to cut the sod. Behind them were seeders or drills. All that breaking, cultivating, pulverizing, and seeding flax was done at one time. That gives you something of an idea of the way they are developing that country and what is meant by the testimony of Mr. Devine when he says they are adopting the latest methods known in the development of that great Northwest.

Here, then, is this enormous Canadian product lying along our entire Minnesota, Dakota, and Montana border just as accessible to Minneapolis as the wheat of those States, the kind of wheat that Minneapolis wants for the grade of flour she makes for the American people—flour which, I believe, brings more in the markets of the United States and the world than any other flour produced. Where will be the market for this grain? If our prices should for a week be higher on the American side, of course it would come in.

Now, if you will again look at the map, you can see the natural flow of that grain. It can come down to Minneapolis and Duluth or it can go on the Canadian roads to Port Arthur. It is practically as near to one section of the lake as it is to another section of the lake. Practically all of the Canadian products must be exported, because, with a population of only 8,000,000, they will produce in a few years more grain than will be produced by us. Therefore their product will practically be all exported, and it will naturally go to the nearest market that will give it anything above the export price. That means that our market must be eternally down to the export price, in competition with the world, while we buy everything upon a more or less protected basis.

I am not, however, claiming that it will come in in any great quantities. We will be producing enough to supply the American demand under ordinary conditions for some years. We will be exporting in some sections of the country for a number of years. And though we might not import one bushel of it in 10 years, the very fact that it is there and ready to come over into this country the moment our prices are above the general world's prices, that of itself will keep our prices down to the Canadian price. Though the Canadian farmer might not export a bushel of that vast production of grain into the United States, he stands there with a club—and an enormous club is this Canadian surplus—ready to beat down the American price the moment it rises above the world's level of prices.

BARLEY.

Does the raising of barley in the United States need protection?

Mr. Mauff states that the world's crop of barley is 1,400,000,000 bushels, and probably 1,000,000,000 bushels of it is fed to animals.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to his colleague?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. My colleague has covered this question very thoroughly, but I want to suggest to Senators who come from States where they do not raise No. 1 hard wheat that they will be the losers just as well as the States which raise hard wheat. We buy wheat raised in the Southern States and mix it with the hard wheat, and therefore the southern farmer is benefited.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think I have covered that.

Mr. GRONNA. I did not hear the Senator on that point. I simply wanted to make that suggestion.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is absolutely correct in that respect.

The barley acreage in the United States in 1900 was 2,894,282 and the crop 58,925,833 bushels, while this year—1910—the acreage was 7,257,000 and the crop 162,227,000 bushels. Note its wonderful growth under protection.

In the five principal barley-growing States of the Mississippi Valley the farmers increased their acreage during that period as follows: Minnesota, from 325,000 acres to 1,285,000 acres; Wisconsin, from 245,000 acres to 866,000 acres; South Dakota, from 108,000 acres to 1,025,000 acres; North Dakota, from 244,000 acres to 987,000 acres; and Iowa, from 444,000 acres to 510,000 acres.

This wonderful development in the increase on acreage and production in the United States is due to the stimulus given the barley trade by the protection of 30 cents per bushel. At the end of the fiscal year of 1904 and while the tariff was 30 cents a bushel on barley, it was worth about 45 cents a bushel, notwithstanding the few markets and dull times and low prices of all products. We changed the tariff in 1904 to a 30 per cent ad valorem, which amounted to about 10 cents a bushel, and we soon brought the price of barley down to about 30 cents a bushel. From the fiscal year of 1898 when we raised the tariff again to 30 cents a bushel, the price of barley began an ascent, continuing until 1908 when it was 73 cents a bushel. The large crop of 1909 brought it down to 55 cents a bushel and the short crop of 1910 brought it up to 86 cents or 90 cents and even $1 a bushel. For the fiscal year 1893 when the duty was but 30 per cent ad valorem, or from 10 to 12 cents a bushel, we imported over 2,000,000 bushels. As soon as we put on our tariff of 30 cents a bushel our importations dropped from about 2,000,000 bushels down to 104,000 bushels, and they have not been of any moment since then. Thus it will be seen that our tariff did have a very decided effect upon our barley during all of these years, and during the last year we have had the full benefit of the tariff, or about 30 cents a bushel.

Mr. Chamberlain says:

> Canada grows 1,800,000 acres of barley, yielding 55,400,000 bushels; 30 bushels per acre, 7½ bushels per capita. The United States grows about 7,000,000 acres, yielding about 170,000,000 bushels; 25 bushels to the acre, or less than 2 bushels per capita. Those are the figures taken from the best available authority.

The average barley yield in Canada is 30 bushels. If it costs $8 to produce an acre of barley, it costs 27 cents a bushel in Canada. The yield in the United States is 25 bushels and the cost per bushel 32 cents, or 5 cents more per bushel than in Canada. With the tariff removed, Canada could easily supply the entire barley market of the United States.

EFFECT ON OTHER PRODUCTS.

Mr. President, I have shown what the effect of this agreement has been and will be on the principal products of the State which I represent—wheat, barley, flax, and oats. Will its effect be injurious to other farm products? If so, what and to what extent? It will, of course, have no direct effect on corn. It may have little on poultry, eggs, and vegetables. It will depend on location. At some points we may be able to export those things into Canada, and in other sections Canada will export them into this country.

For a few years we shall be exporting horses into northwestern Canada to fill the needs of that rapidly developing section. The demand for horses to cultivate the new fields will not allow time for colts to grow horses. Twenty to twenty-five years ago we imported into North Dakota the horses we needed. To-day we are exporting horses. Twenty to twenty-five years hence, if not before, Canada will be exporting horses into this country.

For a while we shall undoubtedly send cattle into northwestern Canada, but their increase, raised and fattened on those vast ranges, will return to compete with our cattle raised on higher-priced land and under less favorable conditions.

The Canadian sheep industry is not now very considerable, but with millions of acres of range land and with freedom of entry, not only for the sheep but also for the wool on the sheep's back, this industry will in a few years become a most earnest competitor in our markets.

The evidence clearly establishes that in the eastern section of the United States our hay crop will suffer severely by Canadian competition. In the West we shall not feel this competition.

Premier Laurier, in his address in the Canadian Parliament, dwelt with emphasis upon the great value of the American market for Canadian hay. His views are substantiated by the evidence submitted before the Finance Committee.

Mr. President, I can not better sum up my conclusion as to the effect of the agreement on some of the products of the farm than by quoting from the evidence of Mr. Hull. He says:

> Mr. Duff, who is minister of agriculture of Ontario, made a stirring appeal to the Canadian farmers of Stratford that it was beneath the dignity of Canada to go across the border and ask for reciprocal trade relations with the United States. One of the leading farmers of that section got up and said:
> "Mr. Duff, I hitched my lambs on behind a carload of Michigan lambs, and when they crossed the border I had to pay 75 cents on every one of those lambs. The American lambs from Michigan went across free. Had we had this relation, I would have had 75 cents more for those lambs. I have been marketing many of my products over there. Had it not been for that, I would have had the money. Could I sell over there in New York, in Ohio, or Michigan my butter which I am producing this year, I could get 8 cents a pound more on the average than I have gotten. I could have gotten 3½ to 4 cents a bushel more for my oats; I could have gotten 30 cents more for my barley; I could have 40 cents more a bushel for my beans. Mr. Secretary of Agriculture, you and your dignity be hanged. I am in this for the money there is in it."

That, I think, expresses tersely and accurately the condition in the eastern section. But I have dealt more particularly with what I know to be the conditions in the western part.

COST OF PRODUCTION.

Mr. President, I have declared as one of the great reasons why we should enact no legislation that would diminish the earnings of the tillers of the soil that their earnings under present conditions are very meager and far less than those of any other class of labor. The occupation of farming to-day is one requiring very considerable intelligence and most careful study and training in order to secure even moderate success.

To-day it requires more capital than ever before to engage in farming and more than it does to engage in most businesses. In my State a half section of land will cost all the way from $8,000 to $15,000, and it would require from $3,000 to $5,000 worth of personal property to run it. You can start in the mercantile business in most of the small towns on only a fraction of this amount. You can start a State bank with a capital of $10,000 and a national bank with a capital of $25,000. And I repeat it requires far more study and judgment to know how to rotate crops, how to vary your plowing and cultivation for different kinds of crops and in different seasons, how to rehabilitate worn-out soil, how to prepare your seed—far more thought and judgment than it requires to buy cloth at 15 cents a yard and sell it at 35 cents a yard.

It is needless to quote to me statistics of the vast number of men who fail in mercantile enterprises. Those same men would, every one of them, fail as farmers. In most instances the same lack of application and industry which caused a failure in their own business would have caused them to fail in the farming business. It would probably be found that in nearly every one of the mercantile failures the owner was doing business wholly on somebody else's capital, and the interest would not stop while he was attending baseball games.

Mr. President, difficult as is the task of ascertaining the cost of producing farmers' products, the very thorough and careful methods adopted by some of the agricultural colleges have reduced the subject to a reasonable certainty. I have made up a table from the testimony of Prof. Chamberlain, of the South Dakota Agricultural College, combined with the reports from the Agricultural Department, showing the cost of production of wheat per acre and per bushel in the States of Minnesota and the two Dakotas for five years, 1905 to 1909, inclusive. This table includes cost of production per acre, yield in bushels per acre, farm value per acre, cost per bushel, farm value per bushel, profit per acre, loss per acre, profit per bushel, and loss per bushel. I have used the Minnesota cost of production for both the Dakotas, having no other data.

Yield per acre from Agricultural Yearbook, 1909, page 450.
Farm value per acre, Agricultural Yearbook, 1909, page 451.

In this table no allowance is made for depreciation in improvements, horses, machinery, insurance, etc., nor loss by hail, drought, and other extraordinary circumstances, and nothing for the large acreage each year which may be either summer fallowed or in pasture or for any cause not producing.

Without going over this table, I simply call attention to the fact that the average profit per acre was $2 during all these years. There were two years in which there was an actual loss, and if we had considered 1910, when there was a total loss, we probably would not have averaged over $1.25 or $1.50 an acre.

Mr. President, there has been very much talk and considerable evidence concerning the difference in the cost of production in Canada and the United States. I have paid little attention to it. I know that in my section of the country there is very little difference on either side of the boundary line, either in the cost of labor on the farm or farm machinery to operate it. It is probable that as the Canadian farmer uses American machinery, which must pay a Canadian duty, that such machinery costs him a little more than it costs the American farmer, although I am informed that this machinery is sold to the Canadian wholesaler very often lower than it is wholesaled to the American dealer. But that is a trivial matter in making up the general cost of production. The two great items that enter into the cost of production are, first, value of land, and, second, value of crop raised thereon. The price of land in Richland County, in my State, is at least twice the average price of land in Saskatchewan. If our land, therefore, costs $40 per acre and produces 15 bushels of wheat per acre, worth 80 cents a bushel, we would receive a gross return of $12 per acre. And if it costs $10 per acre to produce it (and charging depreciation of personal property, insurance, and the many other unlooked-for expenses it will cost more than that on an average), there will be a net gain of $2 per acre, or 5 per cent interest on the investment.

If the Canadian farmer's land costs $20 per acre and produces 20 bushels per acre, worth 80 cents per bushel, he would receive a gross return of $16 per acre. And if it costs $11 per acre to produce it (allowing a little more cost for handling the heavier crop raised), there will be a net gain of $5 per acre, or 25 per cent on the investment.

You will therefore see that to secure the same return the American farmer must make a much heavier investment, and as we must consider the capital employed in computing the cost of production, we should therefore need our tariff wall to place the American farmer on an equality with the northwestern Canadian farmer. Of course, Mr. President, the value of the lands close to the border do not show this difference, but taking the two great sections, the difference at the present time is very considerable. It stands to reason that as soon as the duty is removed this difference will grow less.

But, Mr. President, I have never given my assent to the doctrine that the measure of our protection should always be the difference in the cost of production of an article in this and any foreign country.

In that I do differ from many of my Republican associates. I want protection that protects. I want it just high enough to insure reasonable profits to the producer, after allowing good and reasonable wages for the labor employed in producing it. And I want that protection just low enough, that if the producer, either by combination or otherwise advances the price of his product to an unreasonable point, the foreign goods will come in and force him down to a reasonable basis. I want all of our people to live well. If it should actually cost just as much to produce an article in China as it costs to produce it in the United States, and the Chinaman, because he can live on one-fourth as much as the American can live on, is willing to sell his product over here on a basis of one-fourth the profit the American should have, I would not let his goods come into the country free. And, Mr. President, that is just the ridiculous position this theory of the measure of protection would drive us into if applied in every case. I admit that in most cases it might be just and fair.

The question I ask myself is this: Is the vocation of farming in this country, considering the capital necessarily invested and the amount of intelligence of the labor necessarily employed, as profitable as other vocations? My answer to that question is "No." Applying my principle of protection to that condition, I then conclude that I should give the farmer's products that protection which will insure him just, fair, and equitable remuneration, no more and no less. And that which I would apply to the farmer's products I would apply to every other great product.

PRESIDENT'S POSITION.

Mr. President, I have carefully read the position of President Taft on this subject as outlined in his Chicago address of June 3. I am certain the President wishes to be fair. But it is evident from his address that he, too, is imbued with the very general error that Liverpool fixes the price of our wheat. I have been for some hours engaged in refuting that error; and, Mr. President, I have refuted that fallacy and have shown that the proposition has no possible application where the home demand is greater than the home supply.

The President says:

> The only real importation of agricultural products that we may expect from Canada of any considerable amount will consist of wheat, barley, rye, and oats. The world's price of these four cereals is fixed abroad, where the surplus from the producing countries is disposed of, and is little affected by the place from which the supply is derived.

Let me ask the President this question: The cost of transporting wheat from Minneapolis to Liverpool, including insurance, commissions, cost of handling, and so forth, and allowing no profits for the dealer, is about 15 cents per bushel. If Liverpool fixes the price of wheat in Minneapolis, then Liverpool prices must average at least 15 cents per bushel above Minneapolis price for the same kind of grain. But your Bureau of Statistics of the Agricultural Department shows, by the table I have referred to, that the average price of No. 1 northern for the year 1908 was, Minneapolis $1.11 per bushel, Liverpool $1.25 per bushel, a difference of only 14 cents. The average price at Minneapolis for the year 1909 was $1.20 per bushel, Liverpool $1.29 per bushel, a difference of only 9 cents. The average price at Minneapolis for the year 1910 was $1.14 per bushel, Liverpool $1.14 per bushel, a difference of no cents. How, then, could Liverpool fix Minneapolis prices for that grain when not for a single day during those three years could Minneapolis have shipped a bushel of that grain to Liverpool?

The very next sentence of the President, wherein he proceeds to explain the cause of the difference of 10 cents per bushel in favor of the Dakota and Minnesota farmer, shows that those to whom he has looked for information on this subject have not given him the actual status. The President of the United States, with his manifold duties, can not possibly go into the details of every one of these questions. Note his explanation. He says:

> Canadian wheat nets, perhaps, 10 cents less a bushel to the producer than wheat grown in the Dakotas or in Minnesota, due to the fact that the cost of exporting that wheat and warehousing it and transporting it to Liverpool is considerably greater than the cost to the Dakota farmer of disposing of his wheat to the millers of Minneapolis or sending it abroad.

Note the President says that our higher price is due to the fact that the cost of exporting that wheat and warehousing it and transporting it to Liverpool is considerably greater than the cost of the Dakota farmer in disposing of his wheat to the millers of Minneapolis or sending it abroad. It is clearly apparent that the President is laboring under a mistaken idea that this difference in price applies only to those places where there is a difference in the cost of transportation, and so forth, whereas the fact is that all along the border line between Canada and the United States, where the freight is exactly the same and where the Canadian wheat can go through this country in bond, there is the same difference; and when you get back into the interior of northwestern Canada, where the cost of transportation and housing the Canadian wheat is greater than in the United States, the difference between the United States and Canadian prices is just so much greater. Every case that we have cited has been where the cost of transportation and warehousing was the same on both sides of the line. The average difference of from 10 to 15 cents a bushel in favor of the American side, which we have been discussing, is where the cost of transportation to Liverpool, warehousing, and so forth, is the same. Certainly the President will not contend that it costs more to transport grain to Liverpool from Port Arthur on the Canadian side of Lake Superior than it costs to transport it to Liverpool from Duluth on the American side of the lake. And yet the Duluth market for several years past, like the Minneapolis market, has been from 10 to 15 cents per bushel better than on the Port Arthur side.

In the very next sentence which the President utters in that speech, although given by him to elucidate another proposition, he is unconsciously disclosing the one great cause and the one great explanation of this difference in prices, namely, home demand.

He says:

> The capacity of the American mills is 33 per cent greater than is needed to mill the wheat of this country.

That is the answer, Mr. President.

Now, remember the greatest milling capacity in this country is at Minneapolis. The greatest demand for wheat for milling is at Minneapolis. The supply of the kind of wheat needed by Minneapolis in this country and in the Minneapolis territory is not equal to that demand, hence the higher prices. When the Canadian product can come in from Canada free, the supply will be much more than the Minneapolis demand, hence prices must go down.

There are three other ideas suggested in the President's address which challenge consideration. Referring to this agreement generally, the President says:

> It will not, in my judgment, reduce the price of wheat or other farming products for our people in any marked way. It will, however, by enlarging the source of supply, prevent undue fluctuations, and it will and ought to prevent an exorbitant increase in the price of farm products, which, as they have been for the last three or four years, have inured equally to the benefit of all engaged in agriculture.

And again:

> But I do think that reciprocity will enlarge the reservoir of the supply of farm products for our people, and thus prevent undue enhancement of prices beyond the present standard. If this be the case, then neither the farmer will be injured nor will prices increase.

These two sentences, Mr. President, disclose a conviction in the mind of the President of the United States of three things: First, that the farmers of this country are receiving as much for their products as they should receive; second, that in order to prevent an exorbitant increase in the price of the farmers' products this Canadian reservoir of wheat should be tapped and its contents allowed to enter into this country; and, third, that by so doing the price of wheat will not be increased or diminished in any marked degree.

Now, Mr. President, the proposition of the President of the United States is that the price of the farmer's product is to be so regulated by this free wheat, this Canadian reservoir, that it shall not advance. The justice of that proposition must rest upon the assumption either that the farmer is now receiving a compensation for his labor and capital employed equal to the returns upon labor and capital employed in other vocations, or that the farmer is not entitled to equal compensation. I know the President would not for a moment advocate the latter. I know of no man whose sense of right and justice is more keen than that of our President. In the table which I have already put into the RECORD, and which has the seal of authenticity of the Agricultural Department, the average profit per acre of farming in the States of Minnesota and North and South Dakota, for the years 1905 to 1909, inclusive, the most profitable farming years we have ever had, is about $2 per acre. And remember, Mr. President, that this table leaves out of consideration entirely depreciation of buildings, horses, machinery, insurance against hail, and that it does not include the year 1910, when, on account of drought, there was almost a complete crop failure and a heavy loss in most parts of those States. This table shows what I have claimed again and again, that the only reason that the farmer has been able to exist is that he and his whole family make no allowance for their own labor. In other words, the farmer and his family work for their board and clothing, and mighty cheap clothing at that. The city young man spends $10 for neckties where the farmer boy spends $1.

Now, we will suppose that in a farm of 160 acres there are 120 acres actually in crop each year. The farmer will then have $240 to purchase new farm machinery as the old wears out, buy other horses as the old ones die, clothe himself and family, educate his children, pay doctor bills when they are sick, and buy a cheap coffin when they die. What other intelligent labor in the United States that does not reap a greater reward? Mr. President, I am ultraconservative when I say that 160 acres of land in the Red River Valley will cost at least $5,000, and $3,000 will be required for horses and necessary farm machinery to operate it. That means a capital of $8,000 invested.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will it disturb the Senator from North Dakota if I ask him a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Not at all.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understand the Senator from North Dakota to say that these tables demonstrate the fact that the profit is $2 an acre, and that in reaching that sum the cost of the labor of the farmer and his family is not included.

Mr. McCUMBER. We have not figured the cost of the labor of the farmer and his family. The farm labor which the farmer hires has been figured in, according to the testimony as it was given. I will tell you what is given here. These tables are on the basis of what they call rent—rent or interest on the value of the land.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Then taking the Senator's figures, if I understand them correctly, and his statement if the farmer could charge up in the cost of production his own labor, which he gives and that of his family, the profit would be infinitesimal.

Mr. McCUMBER. As shown by another table which I gave in another address on this subject, there would not be a farmer in the United States who would not be running behind if he would charge up, for his own labor and that of his family, as much as he pays his hired labor. That is the point.

Thus the farmer, in order to secure an opportunity to perform his farm labor, must make an investment of $8,000. If he purchases to-day, he must generally give a mortgage back on the land to secure that purchase price. And I am clearly within the facts when I say, if they start with nothing, as the ordinary laborer starts, the farmers of the United States carry mortgages on two-thirds of the working years of their life whenever they buy a farm; that two-thirds of those working years are consumed before the mortgage is lifted.

How does this farmer's earnings compare with the earnings of a bricklayer in our large cities? We will say there are 300 workdays in a year; that the farmer works 12 hours a day on the average. In the summer time he works 16 hours a day. He would therefore work 3,600 hours a year to earn $240, or about 6⅔ cents per hour. What wage does a bricklayer get in Washington? He gets 62½ cents an hour, or 10 times as much as the farmer gets for his labor. Does bricklaying require a higher degree of intelligence or education than farming? Mr. President, it does not require as much of either. If farming does not require greater study and the exercise of greater intelligence, then the millions upon millions of dollars expended in support of agricultural colleges for information to the farmer has been and is a gross waste. And I am here to deny that it is a waste.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an observation just there?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I listened to the Senator's quotation regarding the wages of bricklayers. I think the Senator will realize that a bricklayer receiving $4, $5, and $6 a day is engaged in one of the unprotected industries of our land. They receive $4, $5, and $6 a day, and carpenters receive nearly as much in my part of the country. Those industries and callings are unprotected. What has the Senator to say to that, I ask him?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not seeking to take away the earnings of the bricklayer. What I am asking is that we raise the earnings of the farmer until they are substantially upon the same basis.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. My point is that your protection fails to protect; that the wages in the highest protected industries are the lowest and the carpenters, machinists, bricklayers, and artisans of this land, who are unprotected, with the doors open to the world, have the highest wages known in our land. What is the Senator's answer to that, I will ask him?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, we had before us a short time ago the wage prices for the different kinds of labor in Great Britain and in the United States. The bricklayer in the protected United States gets two or three times as much as the bricklayer in unprotected Great Britain.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. One more question, Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator. How do the wages of bricklayers in unprotected England compare with the wages of bricklayers in protected Germany, and Russia, and China, and the Orient, generally?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think there is very little difference between the wages of that character of labor in Germany and in Great Britain. I am, however, aware of the fact that in protected Germany every laborer is at work, that there is work for every one of them to do. In unprotected England about a third of them, nearly, are in the almshouse or are begging. Now, that is the difference.

I could illustrate this truth in a hundred different ways had I the time and you the patience. If it is answered that the laborer has to pay a higher rent than the farmer and is under greater expense in many ways in the cities than is the farmer in the country, I reply that it is his higher-priced labor in making the brick, in laying them, in doing the carpentering work, in plastering and papering, that makes the higher rent and the higher expense; and he is, therefore, only expending a fraction of the greater earnings of his own labor.

This answers both assumptions of the President that the farmer is reaping a sufficient reward for his labor and that any material raise in the value of his products might be deemed exorbitant, requiring us to open the faucet of the Canadian surplus. Justice to him demands a protection, so far as it is possible, against competition rather than a subjection to it.

But, Mr. President, the fear of the President of the United States lies in the fact that he does not comprehend the enormous possibilities of this Canadian country. These possibilities have not been brought home to him. It is evident from his remarks that he fears a stringency in food supplies. If he could fully understand the size, the capacity, of this Canadian reservoir, with which he hopes to prevent a lack of food supply, I am certain that his fears would vanish. I am certain that if he knew that this great empire in a few years, if necessity required, could raise more wheat than the whole world now produces he would be more fearful of a Johnstown flood than of a drouth. I am certain that if he understood it as we who have carefully investigated it, and as the hearings before the Finance Committee conclusively establishes, he would say that it is time enough to open the Canadian reservoir when our food supply is really threatened. He would know that the wonderful surplus of this region will always be glad to find our market and we need not, therefore, open our doors to it until we do need it.

FUTURE POLITICAL EFFECT.

Mr. President, what will be the effect of this measure upon the future policies and destinies of the two important political parties in this country? This is not a Republican measure. It is not protection. It is not a Democratic measure. It is not tariff for revenue only. It is a hybrid which inherits none of the good qualities of the one parent and only the bad qualities of the other. The Republicans in Congress are almost solidly against it in sentiment and a majority will be against it on final vote. It can not be charged to the Republican Party except to the extent that it is supported by a Republican Executive. It can be charged to the Democratic Party, because that party, through its representatives and after conferences and caucuses, have espoused it as their cause.

Its effect upon Republican doctrines may not be immediate, but it will be certain. A house divided against itself can not stand. A party, one-half of whose membership supports a policy in exact antagonism to its cardinal doctrines, can not long hold its supremacy.

I am not unmindful of the power of the press of the country in upholding any doctrine. For selfish ends the great press of the country created a false and prejudiced impression and nearly overthrew the Republican Party at the last election. For selfish ends it proposes to support the party next year provided this reciprocity agreement is enacted. But Mr. President, there is a limit even to the power of the press. It is not difficult for it to make right seem wrong by misstatement of facts and suppression of truth, because it is a weakness of our human nature that we seem to get more comfort in having some one else denounced than in having him praised. But it is a much more difficult task to make wrong look right to the man who himself suffers the wrong. And, Mr. President, I can see great difficulty in bringing out that enthusiastic agricultural vote which in all times past has saved the doubtful States to the Republican Party to support a Republican policy of protection when everything on the agricultural schedule must compete in the open markets of the world and with what is destined in a few years to become the greatest agricultural producer in the world—Canada.

I am aware, Mr. President, that the agricultural vote can not consistently turn to the Democratic Party, which has at least mothered this proposition to destroy every vestige of agricultural protection. But I am certain they will see to it that their representatives stand pledged to right the wrong inflicted upon them as nearly as possible, and if their products are placed upon the free list our protective policy will lose its ancient support.

For my part, Mr. President, I am a Republican and a protectionist. I shall continue to be a loyal supporter of that party and of its nominee, because if we ever get back our protection on our agricultural products it must be through the Republican Party.

And I say to the Republican Party to-day: There is one platform on which we can win, both in the election of a Republican President and a Republican Congress, and that platform must read: Fair and just protection to every important American industry. Excessive and unjust protection to none.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the question of reciprocity with Canada is not new. It has been discussed by the people of this country and Canada for many years. Nor is it an untried question. A reciprocal treaty was in existence between the two countries from 1854 to 1866, and the result was not only unsatisfactory to the people of the United States, but injurious to many of their industries. While the policy or plan is understood by the people, yet the terms of the pending agreement are unknown, and I regret that the question could not have been postponed until the regular session, in December, so that they might have become familiar with those provisions and their probable effect upon the country at large. The question involved is one of the most important which has been presented to Congress in recent years. Not only is one great industry threatened, but the policy of protection to all American industries is involved, and the result of the vote on this question will greatly affect that policy. It might be well to consider for a few moments what the agreement contains and what products of this country it affects. By its terms the following products imported from Canada are placed on the free list: Cattle, horses, hogs, sheep, and all other live animals; wheat, corn, hay, oats, and other farm products; poultry and eggs; fruits and dairy products. These are some of the principal products placed on the free list. They are produced on the American farm. Now, what does the farmer get in return? Sawed boards and other lumber not further manufactured than sawed; in other words, rough lumber, pickets, and palings, cream separators, rolled iron or steel sheets, or plates No. 14 in gauge and barbed fencing wire. These are not all the articles placed on the free list, but they are the ones which will affect the farmer. The newspapers get free pulp of wood and news-print paper. On secondary food products, such as fresh and canned meats, flour, and partly manufactured food products the rates are reduced and made identical. On manufactured commodities, such as motor vehicles, cutlery, and sanitary fixtures, the rates are materially reduced. There is a small list of articles on which special rates are given. Many say that it is not necessary to give much time or consideration to this question, because the agreement is similar to the reciprocal treaty that existed from 1854 to 1866. The fact that it is so similar is one of the reasons for opposing it, because that agreement proved disastrous to the United States. Mr. Fielding, who spoke for the Government in the Canadian Parliament, said:

It is the reciprocity agreement of 1854 over again, with comparatively little change. It promises prosperity to the people of Canada, and this house would make a grave mistake and do a great wrong if it refused to take advantage of it.

A comparison of the terms of the proposed agreement with the treaty of 1854 will convince anyone that they are substantially the same, except in the treaty of 1854 the United States secured fisheries concessions not contained in the pending agreement. Before we vote upon this agreement, would it not be a good idea for us to examine into the effect of the treaty of 1854? Mr. Blaine, in his book, Twenty Years of Congress, has the following to say in regard to that treaty:

The right in the fisheries conceded by the treaty of 1854—originally ours under the treaty of 1782, and unnecessarily and unwisely renounced in the treaty of 1818—was not given freely, but in consideration of a great price. That price was reciprocity of trade, so called, between the United States and the British North American Provinces in certain commodities named in the treaty. The selection, as shown by the schedule, was made almost wholly to favor Canadian interests. There was scarcely a product in the list which could be exported from the United States to Canada without loss, while the great market of the United States was thrown open to Canada without tax or charge for nearly everything which she could produce and export. All her raw materials were admitted free, while all our manufactures were charged with heavy duty, the market being reserved for English merchants. The fishery question had been adroitly used to secure from the United States an agreement which was one-sided, vexatious, and unprofitable. It had served its purpose admirably as a makeweight for Canada in acquiring the most generous and profitable market she ever enjoyed for her products.

You will observe that Mr. Blaine says the treaty of 1854 was "one-sided, vexatious, and unprofitable." The Government trade reports of the years from 1854 to 1866 sustain the contention of Mr. Blaine:

Our exports to Canada in 1855 were $20,828,676, but under the operation of reciprocity, then commenced, they dwindled in 12 years down to $15,243,834, while the exports of Canada to the United States increased from $12,000,000 and odd to $46,000,000 and odd. When the treaty began the balance of trade had been $8,000,000 annually in our favor and that paid in specie, but at the end the balance against us to be paid in specie in a single year was $30,000,000. Here was a positive yearly loss of over $5,000,000 of our export trade and a loss of $38,000,000 specie, all going to enrich the Canadians at our expense.

But those who favor the treaty say it is not fair to use the resultant effect of the treaty of 1854 to 1866 upon the country as an argument against this agreement, because they say that treaty existed during a war period. It is true that for four years of that time this country was engaged in the greatest war the world has ever known; but that war did not begin until 1861, and the treaty had been in force seven years before Sumter was fired upon. Again, the bad effect of the treaty upon this country was felt very soon after its ratification—in 1854—and conceded to be unwise and disastrous before it had been in force two years. Another thing, it was not terminated until 1866, a year after the war closed, and there was no improvement in conditions between the date of the close of the war and the termination of the treaty. The benefits of the abrogation of the treaty in 1866 were very soon felt, and our exports to that country have continued satisfactory. They have gone from about $15,000,000 in 1866 to $241,000,000 in 1910.

We do not need it to secure or retain the trade of Canada, for the bulk of that we now have. Our exports to Canada last year amounted to $241,809,233, and our imports from Canada amounted to $103,256,955, or, in other words, under present conditions last year the balance of trade was in our favor to the extent of $138,552,278. This is a good showing for the United States, and it seems to me that it is a good plan to let well enough alone. It would be unwise to return to the disastrous policy which was followed from 1854 to 1866. Our trade relations with Canada are now very satisfactory to the United States, so why should we change them? By the terms of this agreement we are to open to them our splendid market of 90,000,000 of people, and in return they give us the market of 9,000,000 of people, and this, too, a market which is now largely controlled by our producers. There is no better home market in the world than ours, and why should we part with any portion of it without an equivalent return? In order that you may know the extent of the interest of the people of Kansas in this question it is only necessary to tell you that the products of the farms of our State last year, including live stock, amounted to nearly $600,000,000, and the market for the larger part of this wonderful production is found beyond our own borders. But this is only one agricultural State. Consider the resultant effects upon the 7,000,000 farmers, with the 35,000,000 people, who would be directly affected by this measure. But, they say, we who oppose this agreement view it from an erroneous standpoint, and that we should be broader gauged and look at it from the point of the greatest good to the greatest number. We believe if those who favor this agreement will take pains to examine the question they will find we who oppose it stand for not only 35,000,000 people directly dependent upon the farmers, but many millions more who live in the small towns and villages and depend upon the trade of the farming community. And if you add to these the people engaged in other industries affected by this agreement you will find that those of us who oppose it stand for the greatest number.

I quote the following statistics from the speech of Hon. ASHER HINDS, of Maine, which covers the trade of Canada on some important items of the farm, to wit:

In 1908 when Canada was sending us only 23,000 dozens of eggs she was sending England 1,200,000 dozen. While she has in the last five years sent to us an average of less than 100,000 pounds of butter a year she has sent to England as high as 33,000,000 pounds in a year. In the same five years she has sent us an average of less than 150,000 pounds of cheese a year, but her normal annual export to England was, until New Zealand began to shut her out, about 200,000,000 pounds. In 1909 she sent to us less than 20,000 barrels of apples, but in the same year she sent to England more than 1,000,000 barrels.

Now, it is evident if these products of Canada, which now find markets across the Atlantic Ocean, are given free entry to the markets of the United States they will be sent to such markets which are just across the St. Lawrence River or the Great Lakes, and it is further evident that every dozen of eggs, every bushel of wheat, oats, or barley, every ton of hay, every pound of cheese and butter, every barrel of apples and potatoes produced in Canada and sold in this country, means a loss to the farmer of the United States of that much of his home market, and the money paid for such Canadian products will go into the pockets of the Canadian farmer and not into the pockets of our farmers; yet the farmer of the United States will continue to pay his share of the expense to run this billion-dollar Government of ours, increased by just so much as the loss of tariff on these articles entails.

It is not the present products, which, if admitted free from Canada, would injure American producers, but the danger is in what would follow the opening of our ports to her natural products. At present the people of Canada are cultivating only 30,065,556 acres, which is not as large for the entire Dominion as the cultivated acreage in the State of Kansas alone. Have you considered that the land area of Canada is larger than that of the United States, including Alaska? And yet they are cultivating only 30,000,000 acres. This means that there are millions and millions of acres of land which can be had at very low prices—from 50 cents an acre, under the homestead law, up to $10 and $20 per acre. To open up our markets to their products would mean that a large number of people would be attracted to Canada by the low price of land; that great development, improvement, and production would follow.

It is estimated that there are 200,000,000 acres of wheat land in western Canada not yet cultivated, which would yield 3,000,000,000 bushels of wheat annually. Do you think the opening up of these vast tracts would help the wheat growers of the United States? Many of the men and women upon the farms of this country are those who blazed the way to the West and Northwest. They endured the hardships and the privations of the pioneer life. They, and they alone, know the hardships they endured, but they had the courage to stay by the farm, and the soil teems with rich fruit and the fields are blessed with abundant harvest, the result of their patience, their courage, and their labor. These men and women and their children should enjoy the harvest of those fields, which they have cleared and tilled, and they should not be deprived of the great home markets which they help to build up, nor should they be forced by an act of the Congress of this country to share that market with the people of any other country unless they receive a full equivalent in return. This is not done in the pending agreement.

The enactment of the Dingley law started the wheels of the factory, gave labor employment, and the farmer a market, and for 12 years the farmer has enjoyed greater prosperity than ever before. But now, just as he has begun to enjoy some of the blessings for which he has worked so hard, I regret to see some of the Repesentatives from the protective sections ready to force him to share with another the home market, which of right belongs to him.

THE FARMERS' SHARE.

There has been much said and much more written in regard to the farmers' share of consumers' cost. The people are very much interested in this question, and it should have an important bearing upon the agreement. An examination of the reports will convince anyone that the farmer is not receiving any more than his share. Mr. Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, in his report of 1910, goes into this question quite fully, and, believing his conclusions are of interest to the people on this point, I desire to submit the following extract from that report (p. 15):

High prices was one of the subjects of my annual report for 1909. It was shown that for many years previous to about 1897, or a little later, the prices of farm products received by farmers were even less than the cost of production, and often little, if any, above that cost, so that during a long period of years the farmer was not thriving. It was shown also that in the upward-price movement, which began about 1897, the prices received by the farmer have advanced in greater degree than those received by nearly all other classes of producers. That this should have been so was merely a matter of justice to the farmer to equalize the reward of his efforts with the rewards received in other lines of production.

The increased cost of fresh beef between the slaughterer and the consumer is given at 38 per cent; the dairyman receives 50 per cent of the price paid by the consumer; the creamery receives about 86 per cent of the consumers' price of butter; the apple grower receives about 55 per cent; the farmer gets 70 per cent on corn; the strawberry grower, 48 per cent. The farmer receives also 83.3 per cent of the final price in the retail purchase of blackberries by the crate, 75 per cent in the purchase of cucumbers by the third of a bushel, 66.7 per cent in the purchase of egg-plant by the crate, 60 per cent in the purchase of green peas by the quart, 70.5 per cent when hay was bought by the ton, and 82.2 per cent in the purchase of horses from retailers.

Among the many other products represented in this list are oats, with 73.6 per cent of the price going to the farmer when bought by the bushel; melons, 50 per cent when bought by the pound; parsnips, 60 per cent when bought by the bunch; potatoes, 59.3 per cent when bought by the bushel; string beans, 80 per cent when bought by the barrel; sweet potatoes, 60.8 per cent when bought by the barrel; turnips, 60 per cent in purchases by the bunch; watermelons, 33.5 per cent when bought singly.

But to sum the whole matter up, the Secretary says:

From the details that have been presented with regard to the increase of the prices of farm products between farmer and consumer, the conclusion is inevitable that the consumer has no well-grounded complaint against the farmer for the prices that he pays. The farmer supplies the capital for production and takes the risk of his losses; his crops are at the mercy of drought, and flood, and heat, and frost, to say nothing of noxious insects and blighting diseases. He supplies hard, exacting, unremitting labor. A degree and range of information and intelligence are demanded by agriculture which are hardly equalled in any other occupation. Then there is the risk of overproduction and disastrously low prices. From beginning to end the farmer must steer dexterously to escape perils to his profits and, indeed, to his capital on every hand.

We urge you not to attempt to promote your industries at the expense of the farmers of this country. We would have you know that we are disciples of that teacher who strictly charged his followers to do unto others as they would that others should do unto them. The foundation of our prosperity as producers is found in the diversity of our vocations. Agriculturists are the great producing class, but they are not independent of the other classes. The farmer furnishes the food products by which the entire Nation is fed; the consumer furnishes the money to buy the products of the farm; and, therefore, these two great forces should be continued in perfect harmony.

The homes of our farmers, the artisans, and laboring people throughout our great domain are to-day better furnished, have more of the comforts, and are more beautiful than the homes of any other country in the world. The agriculturalists of the country are by far the largest producing class. Their products reached in the past year $8,926,000,000 in value, a sum which staggers computation. Yet these products would not command such prices as they have for 12 years but for the fact that labor was employed and capital profitably invested, thereby giving to the farmer a good home market. By working together we can continue this prosperity, and I therefore ask that we work in harmony and let well enough alone. One of my constituents, in a letter to me, says:

I am opposed to reciprocity, as it will mean low prices to the farmer for what he has to sell. The Republican Party has always contended that the tariff was intended to build up the home market, and now that we have such a market we desire to retain it, but this agreement would compel us to divide it with the people of another country.

Another writes:

We have been enjoying prosperous times for 12 years, and do not see how we can better them by giving up a part of our market. High prices for all our produce is what we have and want. We have a good thing; why not keep it; think Congress should adjourn at once; the people need a rest if Congress don't.

Our farmers can not understand why they are asked to give up what little protection they have upon their products while the factories and corporations are given protection upon their finished products. One writes:

Why free wheat for the farmers and a duty on flour for the millers? Why free cattle, hogs, and sheep for the farmer and a duty upon meats for the Meat Trust and the packer? Why free oats for the farmer and a duty retained on rolled oats and oatmeal for the breakfast-food producers? Why free hay for the farmer and a duty upon the hay press and stackers? Why free butter, eggs, and poultry and a duty upon lumber?

There is another question. They ask why, when the revenues are low, the outlay great, and the surplus getting near the danger line, is $5,000,000 of revenue given up? Why lose the revenue, give up the farmers' market, and get nothing in return? Why is the farmer interested? Simply because he does not believe he is given a fair deal. He thinks the agreement is one-sided. It gives Canada, on all agricultural products, access to our splendid market without the payment of any duty.

Before we pass upon this question, would it not be well for us to see how it is regarded by the leaders in Canada? The prime minister, Sir Wilfred Laurier, in the May number of the Columbian Magazine, among other things, says:

Our policy has been, is, and will be, so long as the Canadian people continue to place in us the confidence they have shown us during 15 years, to seek markets wherever markets are to be found. We are, above all, an agricultural people, and under free competition, not bound in any way by tariff legislation. They will displace all other products on the tables of the wealthy. Our object to-day is to open the door of the American market, to open the door of a Nation of 90,000,000, which has been closed to us for the last 50 years.

Again, in the same article, he says:

Canada consumes only 50 per cent of her production of wheat. Where is the balance to go? All along the shores of Lake St. Peter there are natural meadows, a few inches above the level of the water, which are yearly flooded, and which, to the knowledge of everyone in the Province, have been for a hundred years or more growing hay and nothing else, * * * a very considerable population who are growers of hay, and for whom this treaty, if it becomes a law, will be a most positive boon. To-day they can not sell any hay in the United States because there is a duty of $4 per ton. Let the duty be removed and then immediately there will be an immense trade in that section. * * * The same thing applies in the case of eggs, poultry, and mining products. For this reason it is to our advantage that we should have not only the British market, but the American market also. Then there is the cattle trade. * * * If we are not able to sell all our cattle we can raise in Great Britain there is a more ready market in the United States. Although it was a part of our policy to obtain reciprocity with the United States we have acted carefully in so doing, and have not injured any industry.

The above quotations from the prime minister of Canada should be enough to convince anyone in the United States that the agreement can not benefit the people of the United States. If they are to secure our market of 90,000,000 people for their products without injury to any of their industries, then what will the giving up of that market do to our people? It seems there is but one answer, and that is it will injure our great industry. Do not we lose what they gain?

There is the true reciprocity which the Republican farmers, artisans, merchants, and all others indorse. That is the reciprocity advocated by Blaine, Harrison, and McKinley—reciprocity in noncompetitive articles, reciprocity which provides for a fair exchange, but those statesmen were never in favor of a one-sided proposition that took the duty off of everything the farmer produces for sale and made him buy the necessaries of life in a protected market. This is the way President McKinley defined reciprocity in 1897:

The end in view always to be the opening up of new markets for the products of our country by granting concessions to the products of other lands that we need and can not produce ourselves, and which do not involve any loss of labor of our own people, but tend to increase their prosperity.

I have read the speeches of the lamented McKinley and find in none of them a change of the policy advocated by him in 1897. Listen to what he said in his last speech, the one he delivered just before the bullet of an assassin took him to the great beyond. That great man, whom the people honored and loved so well, said at Buffalo:

By sensible trade agreements, which will not interrupt our home productions, we shall extend the outlets for our increasing surplus. A system which provides a mutual exchange of commodities is manifestly essential to the continued and healthful growth of our export trade. We must not repose in fancied security that we can forever sell everything and buy little or nothing. If such a thing was possible it would not be best for us or for those with whom we deal. We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor. Reciprocity is the natural outgrowth of our wonderful industrial development under domestic policy now firmly established.

So you see the reciprocity he advocated was one which would enable us to "take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor." The pending agreement would harm our greatest industry—agriculture.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I do not know whether there is any truth in the proverb that misery loves company, but if there be any truth in that adage, I desire to afford the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] all the wretched rapture resulting from the companionship of misery.

I hold in my hand a speech delivered by the Right Hon. Mr. Sexsmith, a member of the Canadian Parliament. Mr. Sexsmith is a farmer, and in his address he demonstrates, to his own satisfaction, that the approval of the reciprocity agreement by the Canadian Parliament would absolutely shipwreck the agricultural interests of the Dominion of Canada. He demonstrates that it would depreciate the value of their lands, depress the price of their products, reduce the wages of their labor, and that it would subject them to a competition with the farmers of the United States which they could not withstand.

If the Senator from North Dakota imagines that he has painted the darkest picture which it is possible for an artist to portray, I desire to call his attention to the gloomy prospect portrayed in this picture by Mr. Sexsmith.

Mr. President, I do not believe that either artist has painted true to nature. Both have projected upon the canvas the phantoms of their own overheated fancies rather than the cold facts of international trade and commerce. I desire to ask that this speech be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a companion piece to the speech of the Senator from North Dakota in order that the farmers of the United States may be assured that if this agreement does not result in reciprocal benefit it will at least result in reciprocal ruin.

According to the prophetic vision, according to the equally conclusive and unanswerable argument of Mr. Sexsmith and the Senator from North Dakota, the fair and fruitful fields of the Dominion and of this Republic are destined soon to become a weltering waste of wreck and ruin.

Mr. President, the section of this Union now designated as Arizona and New Mexico was once peopled by a prosperous and enlightened race now known as the Cliff Dwellers. The ruins of their former prosperity still mark the desolate mountain sides of that distant region. They were brought to an untimely end through some unaccountable cataclysm of nature. The remains of those people are still found with their hands clasped upon their mouths as if protecting themselves against the noxious fumes and exhalations from a quaking and distracted earth.

Mr. President, when ruin comes again upon the people of this country, shared by our neighbors to the northward, it will not be through poisoning the air that they breathe. Sir, it will be through a removal of the tax upon the bread that they eat, a removal of the tax upon the wheat and cattle which they import from the Dominion of Canada; and our neighbors will suffer a similar catastrophe from the removal of the tax on the wheat and on the cattle which they import from the United States. I repeat, sir, not from too little breath, but from too much bread.

Some may marvel that such results should flow from this Canadian agreement, but I suppose the fact that it is to precipitate disaster upon both the countries results from that ancient and established canon of philosophy that like causes produce like effects, and it would be unfair for this agreement to precipitate chaos and ruin in the United States without precipitating a similar fate upon the inhabitants of Canada.

I wish to print this speech, so that when these two lands now fair, fruitful, and prosperous, shall become a weltering waste; when the traveler of the future, impelled by curiosity, shall wander through this land, now prosperous, then desolate, he shall find deposited in the corner stone of that mausoleum in which our hopes, our prosperity, and our destiny are entombed the speech of the Senator from North Dakota, accompanied by the speech of Mr. Sexsmith, of the Canadian Parliament, accounting for the catastrophe which overwhelmed this matchless Republic and that splendid Dominion toward the Northern Star.

I ask to have this speech printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMOOT in the chair). The Senator from Oklahoma asks consent to have the speech he sends to the desk printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The speech referred to is as follows:

SPEECH OF HON. J. A. SEXSMITH IN THE CANADIAN PARLIAMENT APRIL 12, 1911.

RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. J. A. SEXSMITH, of East Peterborough. Mr. Chairman, ever since the question of reciprocity has come before this House I have been deeply interested in it, because we have been told by the Government and their supporters that it is going to increase the prosperity of the farmer. As a farmer myself and as the representative of a riding composed largely of farmers, it would, of course, be a great pleasure to me to support any measure really calculated to advance the cause of agriculture, because when the farmer is prosperous the Nation is prosperous, and when the farmer is hard up so is the Nation. Reciprocity is a question that requires deep consideration, and it is a question as to which the Government should be armed with facts and figures in respect thereto, so that there may be no guesswork about it at all. I have listened to honorable gentlemen on the other side telling us that the condition of the Canadian farmer is going to be improved by this arrangement, but not one of them has produced a scintilla of evidence to prove these vague assertions. It is really after all a question of the market conditions in Canada as compared with those in the United States. If the United States markets are better for farm products than they are in Canada, then the Canadian farmer would be benefited, as he would be raised to that higher plane which would be occupied by the farmers of the United States under a prevailing condition of higher prices. But, if the farmers of Canada are enjoying equally as good markets as those enjoyed by the United States farmers, then the farmers of Canada have nothing to gain, and, if the Canadian farmers are enjoying better markets than are enjoyed by the farmers of the United States, then we are sure to lose and must be dragged down to their level. I listened to the speech of the minister of agriculture with a good deal of attention and I read it carefully, but I have failed to find one particle of proof from that man in that speech to show that the condition of the Canadian farmer is going to be improved. I am confident that if the Canadian farmers read the speeches of the minister of agriculture and his supporters, and if they take that reciprocity agreement and study it they will come to the conclusion that it is a delusion, and when the time comes for them to pronounce upon it by their votes, they will declare that they will have none of it. I say without fear of contradiction that the Government went blindfolded into this arrangement. They had it in their power to get all the necessary evidence; they could have made thorough inquiry into the conditions of the markets of the United States and the markets of Canada, and they could have compared the two and told the members of this House and the farmers of Canada just what they were going to get by this arrangement. But apparently the Government neglected to secure any information and rushed blindfolded into this thing without knowing where it would lead to. The Government, not having the information at their command, and having refused to give it if they have it, I have been compelled to go to considerable trouble to hunt up statistics which would enable me to arrive at a reasonable conclusion as to how we stand in trade relations with the United States. Time and again have these gentlemen opposite told us of the benefits the farmers will derive by getting our dairy products into the United States markets, and the minister of agriculture told us the other night that we would sell the United States people what they wanted and send the rest to Great Britain. Well, I have gone into the figures of the exchange of these dairy products between the United States and Canada and vice versa for the last five years; I have taken the imports and experts of butter, cheese, eggs, etc., and if the House will bear with me I shall place them on record. This is the result:

Canada exports to United States.

	1906	1907 (9 months).	1908	1909	1910	Total.
Butter	$36,167	$35,078	$43,045	$54,894	$201,968	$371,152
Cheese	16,389	6,918	27,247	28,936	63,309	142,799
Total						513,951
Eggs	11,924	9,047	9,846	14,952	13,896	59,665

Canada imports from United States.

	1906	1907	1908	1909	1910	Total.
Butter	$54,426	$87,999	$77,994	$156,443	$18,075	$394,937
Cheese	45,904	84,084	116,851	55,030	48,739	350,608
Total						745,545
Eggs	92,172	142,868	216,278	238,842	179,408	869,568

Total dairy imports	$745,545
Total dairy exports	513,951
Difference in favor of imports	231,594
Total value of eggs imported	869,568
Total value of eggs exported	59,665
Difference in favor of imports	809,903

I do not anticipate any great advantage from getting our dairy products into the United States market, but I do think that, on the contrary, the United States farmers will reap considerable benefit from being able to compete with us in our home market. The market which the minister of agriculture speaks so highly of, and as to which he said, speaking on the 13th of December, this year:

"To-day in Canada the production of dairy products—that is, milk and its products—is at the least $100,000,000 a year, and that is at least $20,000,000 greater than was the product of the cows in 1903. The dairy commissioner goes on to say:

"'Our home market is growing at the rate of $2,000,000 a year, and it is already by far the most important one that we have in point of volume, as it takes fully four times as much as there is surplus for export.'

"You will see, therefore, how very important it is in these calculations and discussions not to discard the home market, and not for a moment to base our estimates or our contentions upon the export trade."

We have a home market that consumes $4 worth of our dairy products to every dollar's worth that we export. That is the market which the honorable minister spoke so favorably of, the market we should guard so religiously, and that is the market that the Government now proposes to throw open to the competition of the whole world. I contend that there is no market for Canadian cheese in the United States to-day, and the conditions are such that we were practically unable last year to supply the market of Canada for butter. Of eggs, we bought from the United States in five years nearly $1,000,000 worth more than we sold to them. Yet we are told that there is a great market for our farmers in the United States, and that if they get in there they are going to reap a wonderful reward. On December 13 the minister of agriculture, in his speech on cold storage, referred to our poultry product in these words:

"One thing my honorable friend did not allude to was the poultry production. There is no question whatever that to-day there is a far greater production of eggs and poultry meat than there was 10 years ago, and yet the prices of those things are much higher. Why? Because home consumption has increased more rapidly than home production, and the result is that the home market for eggs and poultry meat is better than the export market; consequently, we have practically no export of eggs or poultry to Great Britain and very little to the United States."

At that time the honorable minister was very proud of the home market. He said we should guard it because it is the best market for our farmers, and in that I agree with him. But, sir, when this reciprocity arrangement was brought down, he immediately turned his face away from the farmer to the interests of his party and tried to deceive our farmers into thinking that they will be benefited by this arrangement which the Government, with the assistance of the servile following behind them, are trying to put through. Now, it is one of the most serious things that could happen to the farmers of Canada to have their home market invaded by all the cheap producing countries in the world. Even if the favored-nation clause did not affect us, I contend that our farmers are in a better position to-day than the farmers of the United States, and we have no reason to open up our market and allow them to come in and compete with us. In answer to a question of Mr. Taylor, of Leeds, on March 9, the following statement was made:

Statement showing the quantity and value of butter and eggs imported for consumption into Canada, by countries, during the month of February, 1911.

	Pounds.	Value.
Butter:
Great Britain	2,800	$689
Australia	15,008	3,009
New Zealand	181,826	41,813
United States	6,838	1,707
Total	206,472	47,209
Eggs:
Hongkong	4,250	193
Chinese Empire	11,138	1,673
United States	719,315	131,341
Total	734,703	133,207

New Zealand is one of the countries that will come in under the favored-nation clause. It is a cheap producing country, and its summer season occurs at the time of our winter season, when the farmers of this country are producing at the highest cost and expect to have a little higher price for their products. If our market is thrown open and New Zealand and all the other cheap producing countries of the world are allowed to pour their products into it, and if New Zealand should send the same average for the 12 months of the year, she would invade the market of Canada in butter alone to the extent of over half a million dollars. I just want to say that if this agreement goes into force the farmers of Canada will get a blow such as they have never received before. Our home market for dairy products consumes over 80 per cent of our total dairy products, but if it is thrown open the whole world will have the privilege of competing with our farmers on even ground. When all these goods come in under duty, what may we expect when we have free trade? The United States are not by any means an importing country. They are producing all they want and to spare. Last year they exported a great amount of dairy products to the various markets of the world. I wish to deal for a little while with our imports and exports of meats. The Government has refused to supply us the market prices, as it should have done, so that I have taken our own trade and commerce reports and our own official records in order to make comparisons. Here is a list of the exports of Canada to the United States from 1906 to 1910:

Bacon and hams:

1906	$59,551
1907	19,190
1908	5,211
1909	208,945
1910	8,569
Total	301,466

We imported from the United States as follows:

Bacon and hams:

1906	$782,330
1907	656,225
1908	851,807
1909	744,694
1910	829,242
Total	3,858,298

Yet this is the market in which our farmers are told they will be able to sell to better advantage than in the home market. The price of hogs, honorable gentlemen opposite tell us, is greater in the United States than in Canada; but if that be the case, how is it we have been buying such a very large amount from them in excess of what we sell to them?

Take our exports of beef to the United States. We exported as follows:

1906	$6,141
1907	11,484
1908	12,708
1909	14,227
1910	12,635
Total	57,195

Of all other meats we exported to the United States as follows:

1906	$67,974
1907	53,613
1908	48,871
1909	60,164
1910	61,508
Total	292,130

And the total of all their exports amounted to $650,863.

Compare that with our imports. We imported from the United States beef salted in barrels as follows:

1906	$159,848
1907	131,718
1908	137,525
1909	122,668
1910	122,444
Total	664,203

Of canned meats, poultry, and game we imported from the United States as follows:

1906	$82,805
1907	28,062
1908	27,596
1909	30,412
1910	45,460
Total	214,335

Let me now give the figures of the other meat products imported from the United States. I have already given the imports of bacon and hams:

	1906	1907	1908	1909	1910	Total.
Extracts of meats and fluid beef, not meats and soups	$64,081	$33,297	$45,503	$40,699	$52,436	$236,016
Meats dried or smoked, etc	155,288	136,574	144,674	69,328	87,302	593,166
Pork, barreled in brine	816,416	634,752	713,726	689,892	924,547	3,979,333
Poultry and game	38,481	40,363	52,175	45,525	57,390	233,934
All other meats	82,037	76,784	100,588	117,572	161,274	538,257
Lard	652,526	584,275	1,073,440	1,228,293	1,358,513	4,897,047
Lard compound	18,818	17,427	54,167	52,538	53,867	196,817

The total value of meats and meat products, including bacon and hams, imported from the United States during these years amounted to $15,411,466, whereas our exports of these goods to that country only amounted to $650,863. There is no use comparing our imports with our exports for one year; there is no use comparing the market of one little village on this side with that of one little village on the other side. We have to make a comparison during a number of years, and deal with it from a national standpoint. There is no doubt that in some places it might work to the advantage of the individual farmers, but, on the whole, it will be a detriment to the farming community of Canada. The total value of hogs and hog products imported from the United States during these five years was $15,411,466. In the same period we succeeded in selling to them hogs and hog products to the amount of $650,863. Is there any honorable member of this House who, in the face of these figures, would say that the market for hogs and hog products is better in the United States than in Canada? Is it reasonable to think that they would leave higher prices and a better market and sell their product here at lower prices?

Mr. TAYLOR of Leeds. And pay a duty?

Mr. SEXSMITH. And pay a duty. The figures show that the farmers of the United States sold us in five years $14,760,543 more than we sold them. In the face of this fact it is absurd to tell the farmers of Canada that we are going to get a better market for hogs and hog products, beef cattle and beef, than we have in Canada. This proposed change would simply mean that we should be subject to the Beef Trust of Chicago. Our local packing establishments, instead of being able to control the market of Canada and to ship to Great Britain, where we have had the best market in the world—a market that sets the price for the bacon of the United States as well as that of Canada, and where we have been able to compete and have established a standard for our bacon that far surpasses that of the bacon of the United States—will come under the domination of the American trust. Let me read a few words from the speech of the minister of agriculture of February 28 last on this subject of reciprocity. And if there is any member of this House who more than another should lay the plain facts before the people it is the minister of agriculture, for the farmers look to him and expect him to give them guidance and not to deceive them. Speaking of the Beef Trust of Chicago, the minister of agriculture on that occasion said:

"I said a moment ago that the packing houses would not disappear. I think my honorable friend had in mind particularly the packing houses in Winnipeg. I have heard it said that the packing houses in Winnipeg would disappear, because Chicago would swamp them when the whole west is thrown open and made subservient to the Chicago market. What is the condition of affairs to-day in the United States? Does the Chicago packing business swamp the packing houses in Kansas City, in Omaha, or in South St. Paul? We know, if the honorable gentleman does not know, that these cities are doing a large packing-house business. I have here some figures to show what that business is in comparison with the packing houses of Winnipeg."

The minister goes on to show the difference between the packing houses of Kansas City and Omaha and the packing houses of Winnipeg:

"In Kansas City last year the local killings of cattle were 1,284,000; of sheep, 1,186,000; of hogs, 1,900,000. The local packing and abattoir establishments of Kansas City showed, of cattle, 773,000; of sheep, 1,256,000; of hogs, 1,656,000. In South St. Paul the local killings were 169,000 cattle, 207,000 sheep, and 823,000 hogs.

"Compare Winnipeg:

"Cattle, 80,000; half of those in St. Paul; one-tenth, about, of those in Omaha; one-fifteenth of those in Kansas City.

"Sheep, 30,000; one-seventh of those in St. Paul; one-fortieth of those in Omaha; one thirty-fifth of those in Kansas City.

"Hogs, 91,000; one-ninth of those in St. Paul; one-twentieth of those in Omaha; one-twentieth of those in Kansas City."

That is, the minister, in discussing the question of the great Chicago Beef Trust, tried to make this House and the people believe that there was no danger of that trust coming into Canada or injuring the packing industry in Winnipeg. The reason he gives is that the packing houses in the western cities flourished in spite of the Beef Trust. But see what he was compelled to admit a moment or two afterwards when he was questioned by my honorable friend from East Lambton [Mr. Armstrong]:

"Mr. ARMSTRONG. I merely want to ask the minister if it is not a fact that these large meat-packing firms in Kansas City, Omaha, and St. Paul are a part of the Meat Trust? I have visited these cities frequently and I know what I am talking about.

"Mr. FISHER. If my honorable friend says that he knows they are, I will not dispute it. I do not know that they are, and I therefore will not say whether they are or not. But that does not make any difference."

I would ask the minister of agriculture: Is that a fair speech to send out to the farmers of this country? Does that give our farmers an intelligent view of things as they really are—to make it appear that there was no danger to our bacon and our beef industry from the Beef Trust of Chicago? I have no hesitation in saying that if this arrangement goes into effect the whole meat business of Canada inside of two years will be under the great combine, the Meat Trust of Chicago, and that trust will pay the farmers of Canada just what it pleases. I pointed out to the minister of agriculture a year ago, and I think in the year previous to that, that the farmers seemed to think they were laboring under certain grievances by reason of the packing industry in this country; that these people had pressed the market down in certain seasons of the year. The minister said that he would have the matter investigated. And this is the result of his investigation: He finds difficulties that might be overcome by proper legislation, but in order to avoid this he says, "Take down the bars, and we will have free trade."

Now, a word or two on the question of the throwing open of our markets to the foreign countries that are allowed to enter under this arrangement. The minister of agriculture, on the 13th of December last, told the House that the Canadian farmer was not in a position to compete with the Australian farmer in raising sheep and cattle. He told us that the conditions in Australia were entirely different. This is what the minister said:

"As I am not acquainted with the details of the business, I would not undertake to say whether my honorable friend is right or wrong. My honorable friend is quite right in saying that the number of sheep has decreased in Canada, but when he compares that with the increase in Australia, Argentina, South Africa, and other countries he is drawing a comparison with countries in which the climate and other conditions are entirely different."

These are the words of the minister himself:

"Australia, both as regards sheep and cattle, is a ranching country. The cattle there run wild over enormous areas and are not taken care of at all. Sheep are in the same position. They have illimitable expanses for pasturing, which we have not, and they have a climate more suitable for that kind of wild life than ours. Therefore a comparison between Canada and Australia in this regard is not a fair one."

Now, the minister of agriculture admitted on the 13th of December that the conditions in Australia were so different from those in Canada that the Canadian farmer could not compete with the Australian farmer in raising beef or sheep. But to oblige our American cousin he says we will allow the farmers of Canada to come into competition with Australia; we will allow Australian beef to come into this country; there is no longer any danger in allowing Australian beef and mutton to come into Canada. Now, I say he is entirely wrong. I wish to quote an article that appeared in one of the Toronto daily papers on April 11; it is headed "Will ship meat from Australia":

"Mr. Arthur Kidmar, chairman of the perishable foods committee of the Chamber of Commerce at Sydney, New South Wales, is at the King Edward. He is breaking his return journey for a day in Toronto, and leaves for home via Chicago this afternoon. Mr. Kidmar is largely interested in the meat, butter, and egg packing industry in Sydney, and has been spending the past year in a tour of inspection through Great Britain, France, Germany, and other parts of Europe, studying particularly the abattoir systems and methods of exportation in the continental centers of the packing industry. He has also been arranging, in behalf of the Sydney chamber, for the exportation of food products from Australia to Great Britain and America. Shipments will be made immediately to Toronto and Montreal, and shortly also to New York."

Mr. TAYLOR of Leeds. And they pay a duty of 3 cents a pound.

Mr. SEXSMITH. This man says that shipments will be made immediately under present conditions, paying a duty, either to Toronto or to Montreal. Now we propose by this arrangement to take off the duty, and let them send into Canada as much meat as they like, and that from a country that the minister of agriculture said a few weeks ago was one that we could not compete with on even terms. Now, speaking of the United States market, and what we are to gain, I want to quote some figures of their exports in the articles I have been mentioning:

Eggs, United States exported in 1909, 5,207,151 dozen, valued at	$1,199,522
Butter, United States exported in 1909, 5,981,265 pounds, valued at	1,268,210
Cheese, United States exported in 1909, 6,822,842 pounds, valued at	857,091
Condensed milk, United States exported in 1909	1,375,104
Lard, United States exported in 1909	52,712,569
Pork, pickled, United States exported in 1909	4,599,431
Ham and shoulders, cured, United States exported in 1909	23,525,307
Bacon, United States exported in 1909	25,920,490
Beef, fresh, United States exported in 1909	12,698,594
Beef, salted and pickled, United States exported in 1909	3,438,048
Total meat and dairy products in 1909	166,521,949

And we are to come into competition with a country with a home market 10 times greater than that of the Canadian people—a home market that exports 10 times more than Canada does. I want to say a word to show what conditions really are in our home market. In the Province of Ontario I find that the total number of swine slaughtered during the year 1909 was 1,986,432, valued at $21,407,549. Our total exports of hogs and hog products for the same year, for all Canada, amounted to only $6,915,577. Thus we see that Ontario alone has produced three times more hogs and hog products than the total exports of all Canada in the year 1909. Is it therefore reasonable to say that the home market is not the best market the Canadian farmer has? In 1909 the Province of Ontario produced $184,747,900 worth of live stock, and there were sold or slaughtered in that Province alone in the same year $64,464,923 worth. So, in the Province of Ontario alone, as a home market, we have disposed of over $64,000,000 worth of beef and other cattle, whereas our total exports of cattle from all Canada during the same year only amounted to $12,254,287. And yet we are told by the minister of agriculture that our home market is not as valuable as it was a few months ago, and we must discard it, and allow all the countries of the world to come in and enjoy it. I do not see the minister of customs in his seat, but I wish to refer to what he said a few evenings ago, in discussing dairy products. He did not care to discuss them in bulk, but for some reason or other, I suppose for political reasons, he reduced pounds of butter to ounces, and reduced dozens of eggs to units, and then told us that we only import two or three eggs and two or three ounces of butter per capita into the Dominion. Let me give you a few figures prepared in the same way. Take the meat products. We bought from the United States annually the last few years $2.10 worth for every man, woman, and child in Canada, while we only sold to them seven-tenths of 1 per cent per capita. Now, I will speak about potatoes, and let me first read from Hansard what the minister of agriculture says about potatoes on the 28th of March:

"In 12 years of high duties the United States accepted from Canada $11,000,000 worth of potatoes more than they sent into Canada. Surely if we can get those potatoes into the States without duty, it will be to the advantage of our potato raisers."

I put a question on the order paper and received the following answer from the minister of customs:

(1) The quantity and value of potatoes (Canadian produce) exported from Canada to the United States during the fiscal years from 1901 to 1910, inclusive, was as follows:

	Bushels.	Value.
1901	231,101	$68,151
1902	808,041	327,046
1903	138,855	56,969
1904	1,451,070	742,537
1905	34,870	18,301
1906	473,239	128,363
1907 (9 months)	8,941	4,250
1908	34,392	15,459
1909	574,454	251,907
1910	678,632	345,903

(2) The quantity and value of potatoes imported into Canada from the United States during the fiscal years from 1901 to 1910, inclusive, was as follows:

	Bushels.	Value.
1901	136,666	$88,649
1902	81,771	87,970
1903	407,425	228,609
1904	77,028	78,025
1905	518,875	232,044
1906	227,155	126,163
1907 (9 months)	94,521	71,065
1908	249,907	195,650
1909	127,110	129,725
1910	217,170	181,751

I notice the total exports of potatoes during 10 years from Canada to the United States were $1,958,886, while our imports from the United States were $1,419,651, a difference of $539,235 in favor of the United States. This is the great market of which we hear so much. Potatoes and hay are the only farm products that we have been able to export to the United States in greater quantity than we have received from them, but this is the market they are going to give us. It is on statements of that kind that we are asked to settle this great question. I have not gone into the figures since confederation, but I think I am safe in saying that the United States have not admitted a million dollars' worth of our potatoes more than sent to United States since confederation, let alone the $11,000,000 worth in 12 years of which the minister spoke.

I shall quote our exports and imports of vegetables. During five years we imported from the United States $3,368,083 worth of vegetables. We sold to them $2,021,054, a difference in favor of the United States of $1,347,029. And yet our market gardeners are told: "Oh, you are all right, you are perfectly safe; you get the United States market, you can ship your potatoes and vegetables there." But they have been invading our markets and selling millions and millions of dollars more to us than we have been able to sell to them.

I have labored hard in the effort to come to some reasonable conclusion in connection with our wheat trade. I have consulted the statistics of the United States, and their market prices, and compared them with Canadian statistics for the last 15 or 20 years. I do not know that it would be wise to take up time by reading prices for 20 years, so I shall read them for the last 10 or 15 years, and give the averages. I shall take from the Toronto Globe the prices for No. 2 white wheat on December 1 in each year; that is, the prices paid to the farmers in Toronto, the United States, and Winnipeg:

[1] Quotations Toronto Globe. [2] Ann. Rep. Dept. Agriculture. [3] Various sources.

I notice, according to these statistics—and they are the only reliable statistics we can get—that the price of wheat to the farmers of the United States for the last 10 years has been lower than the price to the farmers of Canada, even in Winnipeg. We have been told that the wheat production of the United States is falling off, and that in a short time they will require some millions of bushels from the Canadian farmer to supply their own market. The minister of agriculture, speaking on the reciprocity question, said:

"This makes a total acreage in our Northwest of 213,000,000 acres within the wheat-producing area. I do not mean to say that all this land will produce wheat, or will ever be under wheat, but I do not think it would be out of the way for me to say that, in the course of 15 or 20 years, one-quarter of that land, say 50,000,000 acres, will be producing wheat. When that time comes, the Canadian Northwest will produce 1,000,000,000 bushels of wheat. I venture to say that the farmers will need not only the home country and the American market, but also the European market in which to sell that wheat. When that time comes, there is no doubt, there will be in the United States from 150,000,000 to 200,000,000 people, and they will need at least 250,000,000 to 300,000,000 bushels of wheat."

Nothing could be further from the mark than the conjecture of the minister in this respect. I have gone over and taken the production of the United States wheat crop for several years, and the figures taken from the statistical abstract show the following results:

United States production of wheat in each year from 1891 to 1901.

1910	691,769,000
Total for 10 years	6,764,632,000
Average for one year	676,463,200

Last 10 years product, 515,375,600 bushels, an average of 161,087,600 bushels more per year than for previous decade.

They have increased their production during the last 10 years over the previous 10 years on an average by 161,000,000 bushels of wheat per year. That is to say, that in the last period of 10 years they produced each year 161,000,000 bushels more than they did during the 10 years previously. The minister of agriculture told us that in a few years the people of the United States would be consuming all the wheat they could produce, and would require from 150,000,000 to 200,000,000 bushels of wheat per year from us for home consumption. Nothing could be further from the mark. Their increase in the production of wheat in the last 10 years over the previous 10 years is annually greater than the total production of all Canada. Figuring that on the average per capita consumption of the United States for the last 20 years, or for the last 30 years, if you like, at 5.38 bushels per capita, we find that their increased production in the last 10 years was capable of feeding 30,000,000 people, while their increased population was only 16,000,000 people. Instead of the population gaining on the production the production has actually increased twice as rapidly as the population. The United States is now producing wheat for 140,000,000 population, and it is safe to say that in the next 20 years they will be producing for a population of 200,000,000. Where, then, is the market for our Canadian wheat? Why do the Americans want our wheat? Last year they had 48,000,000 acres under wheat, and the American farmer is an aggressive farmer, and under a proper system of farming, if they bring up their production per acre to the standard of Canada, they will be producing in the next few years nearly 1,000,000,000 bushels of wheat annually. Why, then, do they want our wheat?

Mr. TAYLOR of Leeds. They want it to mix with their wheat for export flour.

Mr. SEXSMITH. That is it. I do not think I can explain that better than by reading this from the Ontario Miller, published on February 8, 1911:

"WHEAT AND FLOUR.

"When it is considered that owing to the high quality and superior strength of the wheat grown in the newly opened Canadian northwest, 1 bushel mixed with 3 bushels of the less virile wheat grown in the United States, and ground into flour, is sufficient to raise the whole to high value, it is apparent that the free importation of this wheat would not only fail to depress the price of American wheat, but would actually give it added value, because it would enable the American miller to use the Canadian product as a leaven to raise the value of his mixture; thus every bushel of Canadian wheat exported as flour by the American miller would carry with it a much greater amount of wheat grown in the United States.

"The miller who is able to grind this enormous crop will be the miller of the future, and where he is there will be the great mills of the world.

"With free Canadian wheat secured, the prospect is a grand one, with this enormous and steadily increasing crop free to pursue its natural geographical and commercial channel flowing into the mills and elevators of the States, a splendid tide of activity and prosperity would follow in its wake. Assured of their future supply of raw material, the mills of America would go forward on their developing course, continuing the march of progress which has brought them to the front. New mills would be built and capacities enlarged. New markets abroad would be sought and conquered.

"The returns from this renewed and extended activity would be felt in increased commercial prosperity. New railways would be extended into the wheat-growing territory; American railroads carrying the flour from the mills would secure additional freights; American banks would obtain increased deposits and greatly enlarged exchange accounts; American mill operators would be in demand and pay rolls would be increased; mill machinery, bags, barrels, and other mill supplies would be required in large quantities; more money would be in circulation and the benefit would be felt in every artery of industrial life touched by the milling.

"There would be an increase in grain firms, in elevators, and in every branch of the grain-handling and flour-making interests.

"This would be felt in the added value of real estate and in the solid and substantial development of every undertaking and enterprise that makes a community prosperous. Farmers would find a market for their products, and in the end, should this crop be assimilated here rather than abroad, they will secure an average higher price for their wheat, because of the ability of the progressive and successful miller to pay more for his raw material.

"Canada will lose in transportation, manufacturing, in wages paid expert labor, in wages paid all workmen, in goods supplied, in machinery, bags, and barrels.

"But the greatest loss would be in the by-products which Canadian farmers so much need."

Now, I wish to read from President Taft's speech before the Corn Exchange in Columbus, Ohio, on February 10. He was speaking from the farmer's standpoint, and he went on to show that they had nothing to fear from reciprocity with Canada, but that they had considerable to gain from getting into the Canadian market, because of the majority of commodities raised on the farm the Canadian people had been buying more from the United States than the United States had been buying from Canada. The President then goes on to say:

"Canada is our neighbor on the north for 3,000 miles. Her population is English, Scotch, and French. Her soil is like ours. Her traditions are the same as ours. Her language is ours. Her climate is temperate like ours, except that her growing seasons are shorter and she can not raise corn in any great quantity. She has a free popular government with a wage-earning class as intelligent and as well paid as ours. It is difficult to see in what respect her farmers have any advantage over our own except a virgin soil in the far northwest.

"'How is the farming to be hurt?' he asked. He then took up the effect it would have on corn and wheat prices, on the value of farm lands in the United States, and on the milling industry in the United States. He declared that 'in respect to corn the American farmer is king and will remain so, reciprocity or no reciprocity.' As to wheat, he said the domestic price is governed by the world price, and that 'the sending of any part of Canada's surplus through our country instead of through Canada to be milled or to be exported without milling will not perceptibly or materially affect the price of wheat for our farmers.'

"'The value of farm lands,' he said, 'is affected by the proximity to market more than by any other element,' and he maintained that the American farmer would still have the advantage in this respect. He also predicted a great increase in American milling as a result of the agreement.

"'It is a mere truism,' said the President, 'to say that the farmers of a country constitute the greatest wealth-producing class of the country and that it is of the greatest importance to conserve their welfare. When we have had good crops the wheels of all industries have moved and wealth has been stored. Any one, therefore, who would initiate a policy to injure the farmer has much to answer for at the bar of public opinion.

"'The greatest reason for adopting this agreement is the fact that it is going to unite two countries with kindred people and lying together across a wide continent in a commercial and social union to the great advantage of both. Such a result does not need to be justified by a nice balancing of pecuniary profit to each. Its undoubted general benefit will vindicate those who are responsible for it. I say this in order that by answering the arguments directed to the detailed effect of the agreement upon different classes of persons I may not be thought to abandon the broad ground upon which the opportunity to confirm this agreement ought to be seized.'

"Taking up first the effect of the agreement on corn, he said: 'The total production of corn in the United States in 1910 was 3,125,713,000 bushels, of which we exported 33,072,209, and used the rest in domestic consumption, chiefly in raising cattle and hogs, of which in live cattle and packing-house products we exported in value $135,985,212."

I would like to know how the farmers of Canada are going to gain by getting into the markets of the United States for their beef and pork products, a country that is competing with Canada in the markets of Liverpool, that sets the price for the farmers of the United States as well as for the farmers of Canada, and a country which, according to the President himself, exported last year $135,985,212 worth of beef and pork. The President went on to say:

"The Canadian product of corn was 18,726,000 bushels, or six-tenths of 1 per cent of the total production of the United States. We exported 6,000,000 bushels to Canada. Certainly in respect of corn the American farmer is king and will remain so, reciprocity or no reciprocity. Indeed, the change will greatly help him by increasing his supply of young and thin cattle, now very scarce, for feeding with his corn and making good beef."

They propose to go to our Northwest and buy up our thin cattle and take them over to fatten on their own farms, and, as the honorable member for Brandon said, that country will become the backdoor of Chicago. But the President went on:

"But it is said that the farm land of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, and other States is much more valuable than the land in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Assiniboia, and Alberta, the four great Northwestern Provinces of Canada, and that to give Canadian farmers free entry of products raised on cheaper lands will be certain to lower farm lands in value in this country. Nothing could be further from the fact. Canadian lands are farther removed from the Minneapolis and Chicago markets than the lands of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, or Illinois, and proximity to market is a most important element in the value of farm land. Then the natural change in farming in this country is from the raising of grain for export to the raising of grain for farm consumption and development of the secondary products in the forms of cattle and hogs. The live cattle are bought and fattened. The hogs are raised and fed. It is farming of this kind that explains the high value of farm lands in Illinois and Iowa."

The President goes on to argue that where the finished article is produced the high-priced land is, and we propose by this arrangement practically to compel the farmers of Ontario and of the western Provinces to sell their thin cattle to the United States to be fattened on their farms. The President continued:

"The difference in the value of the acre between Manitoba and Minnesota is but little more than $8, while the difference between Minnesota and Wisconsin is $60; between Wisconsin and Illinois is $52; between Wisconsin and Iowa is $40; between Michigan and Indiana is $31. These figures show incontestably that the fear of a reduction in farm-land values of this country by letting in Canada's products is wholly unfounded.

"The price of wheat, less transportation and other charges for warehouse and delivery, is fixed by what all the wheat-exporting countries, including the United States and Canada, can get for their surplus in Liverpool.

"Hence the sending of any part of Canada's surplus through our country instead of through Canada to be milled or to be exported without milling will not perceptibly or materially affect the price of wheat for our farmers.

"Open up the markets of Minneapolis and Chicago, giving the transportation and warehousing facilities of our Northwest, and the Canadian farmer will get for his wheat practically what the American farmer gets, less the higher freight charges due to greater distance from market. In other words, the advantage we give the Canadian farmer will not hurt our farmer, for the price will remain the same."

Where do you find that the Canadian would get a higher price for his wheat under this agreement? President Taft says it will make no difference; or, in other words, that the agreement will not hurt the American farmer. He goes on to say:

"But by patronizing our elevators, our flour mills, our railroads, he will secure admission to the world's market at a less cost to himself, while we will secure the advantage of increased trade for our elevators, our mills, our railroads, and our commission men.

"The United States secured for the farmers the free listing of such important agricultural products as cottonseed oil, all kinds of fruits and vegetables, timothy and clover seed, eggs, and numerous other products in which the movement to Canada from the United States is much greater than from Canada to the United States. The remission of $1,300,000 in duties on rough lumber imported into the United States by free listing it, along with pickets and palings, and the heavy reductions on dressed lumber, laths, and shingles are all in the interest of the farmer.

"Let the agreement be adopted and go into operation and in six months the farmers on the border who now have fears will rejoice in this great step toward closer business and social relations with our neighbors. The whole country—farmer, manufacturer, railroad company, middleman, warehouseman—all will be the gainer."

That is the argument of President Taft, and I submit that what he predicts is exactly what will take place if we allow this treaty to go through.

Just a word in conclusion about our horse market. We are told that the Canadian horse market will not be injured, but so good an authority as my honorable friend from Dundas, Mr. Broder, pointed out to the satisfaction of every honorable member of this house that the market for horses in the United States is not as good as that in Canada. He showed that the average price received by the farmers in the United States for horses last year was $118, while the Canadian farmers received $133. I have here a table showing the quotations in Toronto and Chicago on March 24, 1911:

Horses.

	Toronto.	Chicago.
Heavy draft:
Choice, 1,650 pounds and over	$260-$350	$225-$325
Fair, 1,650 pounds	200- 250	200- 225
Choice, 1,500 pounds and over	250- 300	175- 225
Fair, 1,500 pounds	160- 200	150- 200
Agricultural—
Good	160- 225	165- 200
Fair	100- 150	100- 180
Express horses	175- 250	160- 250
Drivers	150- 260	175- 300
Saddlers	150- 275	160- 350

With the exception of drivers and saddle horses, the prices at Chicago are lower than those in Toronto. The heavy horses which our farmers have been producing are lower in Chicago than in Toronto, and the market for Canadian horses to-day is our great northwest. That will be our market for years to come. But by this arrangement we are allowing the American farmers, who are closer to our western country than are the farmers of Ontario and Quebec, to sell their horses there on equal terms with our own. Even the Province of Manitoba, which has horses to sell, will have to meet that American competition.

I have here a letter written by one of the greatest horsemen in the Western States regarding the effect which this reciprocity pact is likely to have. This letter is written by Mr. R. F. Williams, of St. Paul, representing one of the largest horse-dealing firms in the United States—Barrett & Zimmerman. He writes as follows:

"To the Farmers:

"In compliance with your request, we are glad to state our view of the proposed reciprocity treaty with Canada, from the standpoint of horse raisers, breeders, and dealers.

"Minnesota and adjoining States are rapidly forging to the front as horse-raising States. The high price of horses during recent years has caused every farmer in our Northwest to buy brood mares and plan to raise a few market horses, thinking the great demand, caused by the settling up of new lands in the West, would continue. The lands available to homestead entry are about settled up."

He is speaking of the United States, of the Western States, where some years ago homesteads were being opened up and there was a demand for horses. Now, however, he says, all that country is practically taken up, and there are no new settlers coming in, as in the Canadian northwest, and consequently the market for horses has decreased:

"The lands available to homestead entry are about settled up, and the demand for horses with which to open up new lands is on the decrease. Moreover, the automobile is taking the place of horses in our large cities. With a rapidly decreasing horse demand at home"—

I would like some honorable gentleman opposite to listen to this, who tell us that reciprocity will not affect our horse market—

"With a rapidly decreasing horse demand at home and a great increase in the number of colts foaled annually, the American horse raiser will soon have a large surplus of horses; and if we do not have a market for them horses will take a decided drop in value in the very near future. It is evident that the only logical market the American horse raiser can hope for is western Canada."

Now, I would like the farmers of Ontario who are engaged in the breeding of heavy horses to notice this:

"No country in the world needs so many horses as western Canada. With the duty off thousands of carloads of American horses will be shipped across the line in the next few years and practically double our local markets and give an outlet for all the surplus horses our farmers raise at stable and profitable values."

I would like to know how the horse raisers of the Dominion of Canada are going to come out on this phase of the reciprocity pact. We have a great market in Canada for horses. The Americans engaged in the horse trade admit this themselves—that it is the only growing market on the continent of America. We have hundreds of thousands of immigrants pouring into the West, and they can not bring their horses with them. The farmers of Ontario and Quebec can raise these horses and supply them just as well as the farmers of Minnesota and adjoining States. And I believe that the farmers of this country are entitled to their home market without being intruded on by the Americans. Just to show what our interprovincial trade has been in horses, I looked up the Ontario statistics, and I find that in 1909 Ontario sold horses to the value of $9,825,476, while we only exported $783,194 worth. Now, I would like to ask the minister of agriculture where these horses were sold? These horses were sold in the Dominion of Canada—that is, the farmers of Ontario disposed of them to the people of our own country, and a majority of these horses, I am convinced, went into the western market, which we have now lost.

Mr. TAYLOR of Leeds. If this bill goes through.

Mr. SEXSMITH. If this bill goes through; but I have great hopes that it will never go through.

In conclusion, I am opposed to this pact as a Canadian farmer. After going into the facts and studying the markets from an unbiased standpoint, I feel it my duty to oppose it, and to oppose it to the utmost of my ability. I oppose it because I am a Canadian citizen, and because I can see nothing else in it but the breaking up of our federation. I oppose it as a British subject, because, to my mind, it will lead to separation from the British Empire. We are told, you preach loyalty. Well, I have heard a great deal of loyalty preached on the other side of the house. They say that there is no danger, as they put it; if I trade with a Jew that does not make me a Jew. Perhaps that is logical, but it reminds me of the old Biblical story of Abraham and Lot. These honorable gentlemen opposite tell us that we can run our trade channels north and south instead of east and west; that we can deal with these Americans, but we will not become annexed. I remember how we are told that Abraham said to Lot: "Let there be no strife between me and thee or between thy herdmen and my herdmen." He said: "You take east and I will go to the west." Abraham knew well what kind of a man Lot was—anxious to grab all the dollars he could. Lot, with covetous eye, looked toward Sodom, the low-lying, well-watered land, and he pitched his tent toward Sodom. He had heard of the people of Sodom, of course. He said: "I will go down and deal with these people; there is no danger that because I deal with them I shall ever become their fellow citizen." And he went down, and they began to deal with him. After a while he said: "Why, these are very fine people," and directly they were wining and dining together. And a short time afterward what took place? Why, Lot's family were intermarried with these people of Sodom, and they became one people, and Lot lived in Sodom. But Abraham remained out in the high altitude and in the open and became the head of a great nation.

Mr. BRISTOW. I submit an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to state that to-morrow at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to submit some remarks on the pending bill.

HOUR OF DAILY MEETING.

On motion of Mr. PENROSE, it was Ordered, That the hour of daily meeting of the Senate be 12 o'clock meridian until otherwise ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 14, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee for our national ensign, a thing of beauty, which stands for law and order, liberty, justice, equal rights, peace and good will to all men; that it has become a national feature to celebrate in song and story its official birth and incomparable history in our public schools, by patriotic societies, and the people in general. Grant, O God, that the ideals which it represents may more and more obtain; that it may float on in peace over a happy, prosperous, God-loving people forever. In the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the proceedings under Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with for to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the proceedings under Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with.

The question being taken, and, two-thirds voting in the affirmative, the motion was agreed to.

THE WOOL SCHEDULE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, with Mr. HAY in the chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM].

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] was addressing the House, he made a characterization of myself that I do not think I should permit to pass unnoticed. I shall not undertake to reply to the gentleman in kind, preferring to follow the manner of gentle breeding rather than that of the coarse and rough.

During the course of his remarks he had, to his apparent satisfaction, successfully established the error of the statement of the leader of the Democratic Party in his opening statement with reference to the bill under discussion regarding the present condition of the Treasury, and was proceeding to show how the Treasury of the United States was bulging and plethoric, and at that time I ventured to inquire whether or not the work on the Panama Canal having progressed since 1902, and all the expenses incident thereto having been borne by the current revenues of the Treasury, that it occurred to me that if the Treasury was in the wholesome and healthy condition that it had been since the inauguration of that work, it was unnecessary to issue the fifty millions of 3 per cent bonds that are now being advertised for sale, carrying an annual interest burden of $1,500,000 to be added to the present $21,000,000 annual interest account we are now carrying; that if the Treasury had been able to carry this expense of over $200,000,000 without the issue of bonds, I questioned the wisdom of issuing bonds at present to refund to the Treasury the amount of money that had been expended heretofore in the construction of the canal, notwithstanding the fact that the right to issue such bonds had existed since August, 1909. It struck me as a little strange that if the Treasury is in the condition described by him at this very particular time it was necessary for the Secretary of the Treasury to issue these bonds now. That statement he characterized as ignorant, and coming from an intelligence so ignorant as not to be worthy of an answer, and immediately, with much show of feeling, refused to yield further in order that I might reply to him and have been compelled to wait until this time to do so.

And yet I fail to see, Mr. Chairman, where his characterization applies; and for myself, having made this statement, I am willing for that accusation to rest upon the person who should bear such a characterization, and I leave it to the RECORD to show whether the gentleman merits his own characterization, or whether I deserve it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] was not in his seat this morning during the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky.

I now yield one hour to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER].

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman, it is hardly necessary for me to explain how highly I appreciate the honor of being a member of this House.

There is probably no other legislative body in the world in which there are so many earnest, bright, and interesting men. However, you interpret things as you see them, and you see them from the point of view of your class—the capitalist class.

The first question you naturally ask of any new Member is, What is your message?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have a message to deliver from the most advanced and intelligent section of the toiling masses—from millions of men and women.

If you will bear with me in patience for an hour I shall try to deliver a part of that message to the best of my ability.

I am told that oratory counts for little or nothing in this House—that you want facts. I am very glad of that, because I hope to convince you within 5 minutes that I am not an orator, and within 10 minutes that I have some facts.

Now, gentlemen, I just ask you kindly to overlook my Milwaukee accent, but to overlook nothing else. [Laughter.]

Some of the gentlemen here have repeated the old threadbare fallacy that the high tariff is to protect labor.

Now, I want it understood that there is no such thing as protection to labor in any tariff bill. I want to say this in the name of the many millions of enlightened workingmen in this country, and in all other civilized countries, who think for themselves.

Moreover, gentlemen, you are not in the habit of making laws for the protection of labor. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You are continually making laws for the protection of life and property—for the protection of the lives of those who own the property, and for the protection of the property they own. You are continually making laws for manufacturers, bankers, and merchants.

But the workingman who has no other property than his labor gets scant protection, indeed.

If he wants to be protected, he must commit a crime; he must steal or get drunk and disturb the peace or become a tramp. Then the law gets hold of him and gives him protection. Then he gets the protection of the jail or the penitentiary.

As long as he is well and decent the law does not protect him. The high tariff does not protect him.

What is the philosophy of the tariff?

The history of the protective tariff is the same in every country.

Agricultural countries subsidize manufacturers for the purpose of creating industries.

In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries England became the foremost manufacturing country of the world. Germany, which before had supplied the world with manufactured goods, had been thrown back in civilization and culture by the horrors of the religious wars incident to the Reformation.

England bought the raw material of the world and sold the manufactured product. In order to build up industries in their own countries the European rulers tried to protect their manufacturers against the importation of English goods by putting up a high tariff.

The history of the American tariff is very much the same. The tariff reaches back to the days of Alexander Hamilton and is based upon the same idea.

It simply meant subsidizing the manufacturers so as to build up industries. It meant that the Nation was paying the manufacturer a bonus for investing his money in manufacturing.

The result in every country has been the same.

The high tariff at first stimulated competition. Everybody who had any money or any business talent went into the manufacturing business.

That tendency, of course, cut down the profits. It culminated in this country about 1892, when one of those periodical crises which are a part of our industrial system set in.

The result was natural enough. No matter whether we have a high tariff or free trade, competition has a tendency to weed out the economically weaker concerns.

That process of weeding out is mightily stimulated by these industrial crises, a matter to which I shall refer again later.

The process of weeding out went merrily on in this country. Toward the end of the last century a number of the remaining big firms found it more profitable to unite than to continue the fight.

There you have the origin of trusts.

It is not fair to ascribe the origin of trusts entirely, or even mainly, to the high tariff.

The high tariff is responsible for the trusts only as it stimulates competition, and inasmuch as it subsidizes the manufacturers.

But the outcome of competition is always the same. Competition always kills competition in the end. We find trusts in high-tariff America and in free-trade England. We find trusts in Germany and even in little Holland. As a matter of fact, every flourishing industry winds up in a trust.

I can go still further. I will say that in every manufacturing country the manufacturers at first demand protection and get it.

They want protection in order to conquer the home market—the market in their own country. They demand it as a matter of patriotism. Business men are always patriotic when there is profit in sight. [Laughter.]

But the business man, after he has gained control of the home market and reaches out for the profits in other countries, changes from the patriot to the cosmopolite.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BERGER. No; I shall ask the gentleman to wait until I have developed my theme, and then I shall be very glad to answer all questions. I am here to answer questions for the next year and a half. [Laughter.]

The business man suddenly finds that the high tariff—the same high tariff which has helped him to control the home market—is a chain on his legs when he wants to conquer the world market. Therefore he is willing to drop the tariff.

This is the case with the highly protected iron industry. The leading spirits in that industry are just about ready to drop the high tariff not only for iron, but for everything else.

Thus, the New York Sun of Thursday, June 8, says:

> Possibly this country might continue to keep out of the poorhouse, grow wool, and make clothes, even if they have not the heaven-born tariff to consecrate every sheep and every manufacturer.

Considering that the New York Sun is supposed to be Pierpont Morgan's mouthpiece and the organ of standpattism in industry, this is rather a frank admission.

Moreover, no lesser authority than Mr. Carnegie has declared that we are ready for a reduction of duties in the iron industry.

I am not, however, concerned with the manufacturers' side of this question. The manufacturers are well able to take care of themselves, and they are exceedingly well represented in this House. [Laughter.]

What I want to bring out is that it never was intended that the high tariff should protect the workingman. That pretense was simply an afterthought, because the workingmen have votes. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] Only American manufacturers have dared to tell this falsehood to their workingmen. Why? Because until very recent years American workingmen were more ignorant on economic and social questions than their brothers in Germany or France.

The highly protected manufacturers of Germany never dared tell their workingmen that the tariff was there to protect the workingman. The protected manufacturers of France never dared tell their workingmen that the tariff protected them.

It was only in this country, after the infant industries had become giants, that some of our Pennsylvania politicians conceived the idea of claiming that the high tariff was here to protect the workingman.

But this issue shows plainly the paramount influence of our manufacturers and traders in political affairs, even though every workingman in America has a vote. The manufacturers palm off their private issues as national issues.

It is the manufacturers who want protection; it is the commercial men, and mainly the importers, who want free trade.

The manufacturers, as I said before, pretend that protection benefits the working classes.

But that this claim is a mere sham is evident from the fact that they have never proposed to discourage the immigration of foreign workingmen; that, on the contrary, they have always done all they could to encourage foreign laborers to come over; that they have even sent agents to Europe to coax laborers by false pretenses.

There can be no doubt that wages are better here than in European countries, but the causes of this fact have little or nothing to do with the tariff.

The workman in highly protected Germany has somewhat the advantage, in wages and hours, over the workman in highly protected France. The workman in free-trade England has a shade the advantage over the workman in highly protected Germany.

It can not be shown that the tariff has any general effect upon wages.

Higher wages in the United States are due to a number of highly complex factors.

There is, first, the higher efficiency of the American workman, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] pointed out in his interesting speech day before yesterday. There is, next, the more perfected machinery upon which he works. There is also the advanced development of trades unionism. There is, furthermore, the fact that, until recently, large tracts of public land served constantly to draw off some part of the competing laborers of the towns and cities to the country.

Finally, there is the fact that the economic system, as a whole, has never settled down in America into the hard and fast groove in which it runs in Europe.

Indeed, that system in America still retains something of the elasticity of colonial times.

Since the great strike in Pittsburg in 1892—which ended with the battle on the Monongahela—the claim that the high tariff protects the workingman has become more rare. I should not advise the gentleman from Pennsylvania or any other gentleman to make such a claim before an audience of workingmen of Pittsburg, Chicago, or Milwaukee when there is a strike on for living wages in some branch of the iron industry.

While the products of our factories are highly protected, sometimes as highly as 200 per cent, the producers of these products are not protected at all. On the contrary, during the last 20 years Slavonians, Italians, Greeks, Russians, and Armenians have been brought into this country by the million. Simply because they have a lower standard of living they have crowded out the Americans, Germans, Englishmen, and Irishmen from the workshops, factories, and mines of our highly protected industries.

And in the steel mills of Pittsburg, Chicago, and Milwaukee, where 30 years ago the so-called princes of labor used to get from $10 to $15 a day, the modern white coolies get $1.75 for 12 hours a day, seven days in the week—having no time to praise the Lord, and no reason either. [Laughter.]

As for the manufacturers of woolen goods, Bulletin 57 of the Census Bureau, which gives the figures on manufactures for 1905, shows (p. 93) that 44,452 youths and men, 24,552 girls and women, and 3,743 children under 16 employed in the manufacture of woolen goods receive a yearly average of $396 and a weekly average of $7.61.

The same bulletin shows that 29,883 youths and men, 32,130 girls and women, and 7,238 children under 16 employed in the manufacture of worsted goods receive a yearly average of $379 and a weekly average of $7.30.

According to social workers who have made a study of family budgets, the minimum requirement in the United States for a decent living for a family consisting of father, mother, and three small children is $750 a year. I believe that estimate is much too low, and that none of the gentlemen in this House would want to live on it. However, the average wages in these two highly protected industries are but litfle more than half this sum.

It is true that this average takes in the wages of children and youths. But, on the other hand, it also takes in the wages of the highly skilled mechanics and of foremen. It is therefore a fair average; and it shows a wage entirely inadequate to support a decent standard of living.

As for me, I am against all tariffs—high tariffs or low tariffs—and against low tariffs as a proposition to raise revenue.

Every tariff, high or low, means that it hits the poor man worst. So long as a tax is placed on the necessities of life, it will fall upon the poor man much more heavily than upon the rich man. [Applause.]

To begin with, it is the poor people who, as a rule, have many children. The tax on shoes will strike a poor sewer digger who has six children six times as hard as it will the millionaire, who has one child. Moreover, the digger can afford it 1,000 times less. [Applause.]

Every tariff puts the burden upon the people who can afford it least. Every tariff means that the wealthy people are not willing to pay their share of taxes and that they want the poor people to pay it for them. It means that these taxes go to the manufacturer.

This is all any tariff means.

It is in all cases an inheritance of the Middle Ages—the Dark Ages—when the privileged classes did not pay any taxes and the common people had to pay them all.

The only just tax is an income tax [applause] which is graduated to such a degree that it will establish some fairness as to the intensity with which it is felt by the poor people as compared with the rich.

I do not want to be understood to imply that the working class is benefited by free trade of itself. Free trade is no panacea. Free trade would mean that a great deal of our manufacturing would be done across the sea—particularly all of the manufacturing that has not yet reached the trust stage. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Moreover, the working class can not endure any sudden lowering of tariffs. It is helpless to protect itself from the consequences.

Especially in our country, after many years of the highest kind of a high tariff, any sudden change would be disastrous, and that is where the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] was wise. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There are whole communities built up on a tariff schedule on some manufactured commodity. A radical and sudden lowering of the tariff on any of those products would, of course, unsettle conditions, close workshops, and deprive thousands of wage earners of their jobs. And since under our planless system of production no provision whatever is made for the displaced workers, the result would be widespread disaster and misery. [Applause on the Republican side.] When society is willing to undertake the transfer of displaced workers from a dying industry to a flourishing one we can then welcome any radical change in the tariff that seems best for the Nation as a whole.

Labor does not need the so-called protection of tariffs. It does need, however, protection against sudden changes for the worse in economic conditions. And in so far as it has had any protection it has protected itself by forming trade unions. It has protected itself by strikes and boycotts, which have been declared by the Supreme Court of the United States to be illegal.

But, illegal or not, I hope labor will continue to use them in order to resist the forcing down of the standard of the bulk of our population to a Chinese level. [Applause.] For in many respects we have been coming down continually. [Applause.]

Before this, the capitalist era, common workingmen in England could live a whole week on the earnings of four days.

Now, in Pennsylvania and elsewhere, common laborers can scarcely live a week on the earnings of seven days of excessive toil.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman, this is the first time that the socialists' view on the tariff has ever been heard in this House, and if the gentleman will kindly give me a chance to get through with my statement, I shall be very glad to answer any questions that he may wish to ask, and I have no doubt that he will be able to ask them with much more profundity than now. [Laughter and applause.]

There is always free trade in labor.

Under the present system, which we call in political economy the capitalist system, the workingman's labor has become a mere ware in the market. And since the man's labor can not be separated from the man, the workingman himself has become a commodity, whose time is bought and sold. The workingman, or rather his labor power, is subject to the same conditions as every other ware, especially to the conditions of supply and demand and to competition.

The workingman's labor, or rather his time, is bought now in the open market by the highest bidder on the one hand from the lowest seller on the other.

And the employers, that is, the master class, care only to buy the workingman's time when he is young, strong, and healthy. When he is sick or when he gets old the employer has no use for him.

The employer is not in business for the sake of charity. He is in business in order to make profits—to make money.

And because of this we see that our so-called free workers are sometimes worse off—from the purely economic point of view—than the blacks were under slavery before the war.

The negro was property and represented about $1,000 in value—sometimes more, sometimes less. He was property which his master owned. Therefore the master, if he had any sense, took good care of his human chattel. The master was eager to have the slave as long and in as good condition as possible. When the slave became sick or when he died the master lost money.

The case is entirely different with the white workingman, the so-called free workingman. When the white man is sick or when he dies the employer usually loses nothing.

And high tariff, or tariff for revenue only, or free trade, like "the flowers that bloom in the spring, have nothing to do with the case." [Laughter.]

The fact is that the capitalist, the average employer to-day, is more concerned about a valuable horse, about a fine dog, about a good automobile, than he is about his employee or about his employee's family.

In most cases the employment is absolutely impersonal. The employer does not know his employee by name, or even by number. This is invariably the case with a stock company where the shareholders are scattered all over a city, a State, or all over the country; sometimes over Europe.

Nor can any individual capitalist or employer, no matter how charitably inclined he may be, change anything in these conditions. A business or corporation that should try to run its plant on a charity basis would not last long.

As a matter of fact, under the present system it is usually the worst employer who sets the pace. The employer who can fleece and skin his workingmen best is best equipped for the fight in the open market. He can produce his goods the cheapest.

Thus competition has come to have a fearful meaning to the working class.

On the one hand, it compels the employers to get their labor as cheaply as possible; on the other hand, it compels the workingmen to compete with one another for jobs.

Competition among the workers has become, therefore, a cutthroat competition. It is a question as to who is to live and who is to starve. It is often a question as to whether a man is to stay with his family or become a tramp.

And the tariff has nothing to do with that question, either.

There is always free trade in labor.

In many cases now the laborer is compelled to disrupt his family and send his wife and children to the shop or factory.

For this is the greatest curse of machinery—or, rather, the individual monopoly of machinery—that capital can be coined out of women and even out of infancy. Thus, not alone are men turned into wares, governed by demand and supply, but they are also made to scramble for a precarious living with their wives, sisters, and children.

In the cotton factories of the South, from where my Democratic free-trade friends come, the women and children compose two-thirds of the working force. Very similar are the conditions in our large cigar and tobacco factories and in the workshops of many other industries.

Laws against this sort of thing are almost useless as long as the present economic system prevails.

For while it is notorious that the wages thus earned by a whole family do not on an average exceed those of the head of the family in occupations where it has not become habitual to employ women and children, the abuse is still daily gaining ground.

And the reason is very simple. Women and children do not go into the factory for the fun of it; they are brought there by dire necessity, by competition. And it is competition, too, that compels the little children of the southern poor white people to go to the cotton factory and offer their young lives to be turned into dollars. Here are the figures of children from 10 to 15 years of age, inclusive, employed in 1900 in 11 Southern States, with the percentage of the total number of children of that age period:

States.	Males.	Per cent of total.	Females.	Per cent of total.
Virginia	44,651	33.7	11,094	8.5
West Virginia	22,343	33	2,481	3.9
North Carolina	77,986	55.1	32,421	23.5
South Carolina	56,363	53.8	38,917	38.3
Georgia	77,462	46.7	36,502	22.6
Kentucky	53,676	35.4	7,441	5.1
Tennessee	63,711	43.2	12,651	8.9
Alabama	80,989	59	41,664	31.3
Mississippi	63,906	53.8	34,103	29.7
Louisiana	39,620	39.4	21,427	21.6
Arkansas	49,747	50.1	15,321	15.8

Nor are conditions in most of the Northern States much better.

With a system like this it is only natural that the rich should become richer and the poor poorer.

Free competition imposes no restraint upon the powerful. They are at liberty to exploit the poor workman to their hearts' content.

And another thing: The strength on the capitalist side is so great, and the capacity for resistance on the side of the workmen is so insignificant, that there is actually no freedom of contract. The monopoly of the tools has made the employers a class of autocrats and the laborers a class of dependents—of hirelings. The laborer is simply a hired appendage to the machine.

The machine has come to be the main thing, the costly thing. The living appendage, the laborer, can be gotten without much trouble or cost. Nowadays, if an owner of tools does not want to let a workingman work, the latter has no means of subsistence unless he finds some other "lord of production" who will permit him to produce something.

And so this system now creates the dependence of the thousands upon the few.

It is a paltry evasion of our capitalists to say that the workers are free to accept or to refuse the terms of their employers. The laborers have to consent. If they refuse the terms, there are plenty of others, hungry, starved, and desperate, ready to take their places. But suppose it were possible that the employer could not get other men to take the places of those who refused the terms offered—and, pray, do not for a moment think that this could actually be the case—the employer could stand it; he would merely stop business for the time being. And do not imagine for one instant that he would suffer privation by so doing. His home would be just as radiant with luxuries as ever, and he would probably try to endure life by a trip to some foreign country.

Now, another important consideration:

Since the working people do not receive the full value of their products—because a considerable profit is made by the employing class on everything the workers produce—can they be expected to buy back these products? Their numerical strength makes them the chief consumers of the country and those on whom production mainly depends.

In this way, by the laboring people not being able to consume enough, and by the planless way in which production is carried on in general, the so-called overproduction is created.

Of course, no matter how much or how little the toilers of a nation create, they always create more than they are able to buy with their wages, because they have never received the full value of that production.

In this way the so-called industrial crises originate. They have come upon us about once in every 20 years, roughly speaking, since capitalist production began its sway. At such times the trade and the manufacturing of a nation come to a standstill, because "there is too much on hand."

And the working people have to stop work and go ragged and hungry because there is too much on hand.

Statesmen, newspapers, lawyers, and so-called reformers on such occasions claim that it is either too much silver or too little silver, or lack of confidence, or what not, that is the cause of the industrial crisis, or panic, as it is sometimes called.

But hard times are really hard only on those whose subsistence depends on their having work to do.

For the poor people the times are always hard.

During "hard times" the wives and daughters of the capitalists, however, do not leave off attending balls, parties, and operas, in their silks and diamonds.

On the contrary, if the times are very hard, the wealthy and charitable people simply arrange one more amusement and call it a "charity ball."

As far as security of work is concerned, the workman of the present time is worse off than any of his predecessors in history. In fact, the irregularity of his employment, the frequency with which he is out of work, is the most alarming feature of the workingman's condition. The toiler of to-day can not work when he wants to, or when he ought to, in order to support himself and family. He can work only when it is to the profit of the employer that he should do so.

How all this came about—well, it is simply a matter of industrial evolution.

In the Middle Ages, before capitalist production had come upon the stage of events, a system of small industries prevailed, and, in some few cases, has continued to the present day.

This system rested on the private ownership by the workman himself of the means of production. The instruments of labor were then paltry, dwarfish, and cheap; and for that very reason, as a rule, they belonged to the producers themselves. Since the fifteenth century, and especially since the power of steam was utilized, these limited implements of production have been gradually enlarged, united, and improved, until the common tool of the Middle Ages, and even some of the instruments that were common 50 years ago and later, have been transformed into the machines of to-day.

In place of the hand loom, the spinning wheel, and the smith's hammer there appeared the mechanical loom, the spinning macine, and the steam hammer. Instead of the single workshop there appeared the factory that combines the united labor of hundreds and of thousands. At the same time production was transformed from a series of isolated—individual—acts into a series of social and combined acts.

The yarn, the cloth, the metal articles which now come out of the factory are the joint product of the many people through whose hands they had to go successively before being ready.

No single person can say of them: "This I have made." Yet these social tools and social products are treated in the same way as they were at the time when the tool was an individual tool and when the product was created by the individual. So the present new mode of production remains subject to the old form of appropriation, although the new form of production does away with the very conditions on which the old form was based. In times of old the owner of the simple tool appropriated or took for his own use his own product, while now—and it is important to grasp this fact fully—the owner of the tool, of the machine, appropriates the work of others. He appropriates this work without a jury and without a verdict.

And so we see plainly that the private ownership of the means of production, which was formerly the means of securing the product to the producer, has now become the means of exploitation, and, consequently, of servitude.

The development of the tool into the machine separates the workman from his product. In this way a comparatively small number of capitalists obtain a monopoly of the means of production.

We are often inclined to deprecate the resistance of the workingmen to the introduction of machinery.

But these victories of the human intellect over the forces of nature which naturally should be a benefit to all—an unlimited source of blessing to the human race—have often become a means of torture to the toilers.

How many wage earners has the introduction of machinery thrown out of employment? How many lives have thereby been destroyed?

All the advantage of all the new inventions, machines, and improvements now goes mainly to the small class of capitalists; while on the other hand these new inventions, machines, improvements, and labor devices displace human labor and steadily increase the army of the unemployed, who, starved and frantic, are ever ready to take the places of those who have work, thereby still further depressing the labor market.

It is from this army that the capitalist class recruit their special police, their deputy sheriffs, their Pinkerton detectives, and some of their minor politicians.

And the wageworkers are by no means the only sufferers. The small employers, the small merchants, are also feeling the sting of an unequal competition.

For every one of these men of business lives at war with all his brethren. The hand of the one is against the other, and no foe is more terrible to him than the one who is running a neck race with him every day.

Therefore, in the factory as well as in the store, the wages must be cut constantly, and the sales must be ever enlarged. The latest improvements, the best labor-saving machinery, must be used and as litle wages must be paid as possible. The race is for life or death and "the devil gets the hindmost."

The fierce competition lessens the profit on each article, and this must be compensated for by a greater number of articles being produced and sold; that is, the cheaper the goods the more capital is required to carry on the business.

Precisely, then, for the same reason that the mechanic with his own shop and working on his own account has nearly disappeared in the struggle between hand work and machine work—for precisely the same reason the small manufacturers, with their little machinery, their small capital, and their little stock of goods, are now being driven from the field.

And the same is the case with the little store that must compete with the department store or the mail-order house.

It is that class that is yelling most loudly against the corporations, the railroads, and the trusts.

It is that class that wants the Sherman law to be made "more effective." It is that class that would like to turn the wheel of economic evolution backwards.

We can not destroy the trusts without destroying our civilization.

Moreover, we do not want to destroy them. The trusts bring some system into the industrial chaos. They are the forerunners of a new social order. They have put the first effective check upon the disastrous evils of competition.

While competition grows more intense among the workers looking for jobs, and while it still prevails among the small traders and small manufacturers, the trusts have abolished competition in the realm of "big business."

The trusts are undoubtedly a milestone in the industrial evolution of the race. The trusts spell progress and are a tremendous benefit. So far, however, they are mainly a benefit to their owners.

What we must do, therefore, is to extend the benefits of this ownership to the entire Nation.

The national ownership of the trusts must be our next great step in evolution. The Sherman law ought to be repealed and a law enacted to nationalize every industry where the output and the prices are controlled by a trust or a privately owned monopoly.

On the other hand, it is the trusts which by their very magnitude have made the viciousness of the capitalist system clear to everyone.

We see that the purely individualist theory of private ownership of "property"—which our competitive wage system has made the foundation of society—has resulted in practically abolishing the possibility of private ownership for the great majority of the people.

One-tenth of our population already owns more than four-fifths of the wealth. The centralization of the control of property is increasing with a rapidity that threatens the integrity of the Nation. The average of wages, the certainty of employment, the social privileges and independence of the wage-earning and agricultural population, when compared with the increase of the wealth and social production, are steadily and rapidly decreasing.

And the very worst of the social temptations is that wealth has become the greatest, one might say the only, social power. All human worth is estimated in terms of wealth—in dollars and cents.

Things can not go on like this indefinitely. White men will not always stand it. We are by our present circumstances and consequences creating a race of "white people" in our midst, compared with which the vandals of the fourth century were a humane nation.

Within a short time, with present tendencies unchecked, we shall have two nations in this country, both of native growth. One will be very large in number, semicivilized, half starved, and degenerated through misery; the other will be small in number, overfed, overcivilized, and degenerated through luxury.

What will be the outcome?

Some day there will be a volcanic eruption. A fearful retribution will be enacted on the capitalistic class as a class, and the innocent will suffer with the guilty.

Such a revolution would throw humanity back into semibarbarism and cause even a temporary retrogression of civilization.

Various remedies have been proposed. Single tax, more silver dollars, greenbacks, and a dozen other remedies have been offered. But since none of them does away with the deadly effects of competition, and with the effect of the machine on the workman, I must dismiss them as insufficient. This is particularly the case with the single tax, which would simply for a time sharpen competition and thus increase the misery of the working class.

The other day we listened to a fervid plea for the single tax delivered on this floor by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GEORGE]. He gave particular attention to the introduction of this system in Vancouver, British Columbia, and painted in glowing colors the blessings that had followed it. And now comes the distressing news that Vancouver is in the midst of a general strike, the first of its kind in that city, involving every organized workman there. Evidently the single tax is not a substitute for bread and butter. [Laughter.]

But this is what the Socialists say:

The machinery and all the progress in implements of production we can not and do not want to destroy. Civilization does not want to go back to the Middle Ages or be reduced to barbarism.

And as long as these implements of production—land, machinery, raw materials, railroads, and telegraphs—remain private property, only comparatively few can be the sole owners and masters thereof. As long as such is the case these few will naturally use this private ownership for their own private advantage.

The highest industrial order which competitive individualism has given us, and can give us, is that of capitalist and wage earner.

A capitalist and wage-earner order of society inevitably ends in the economic rule of a comparatively few absolute masters over a numerous socially subject class.

The wage system was a step in the evolution of freedom, but only a step. Without trade-unionism and labor associations the wage system would produce a social state lower than that of feudalism.

There can be no social freedom nor complete justice until there are no more hirelings in the world; until all become both the employers and the employed of society.

This social freedom, this complete justice, can be accomplished only by the collective ownership and democratic management of the social means of production and distribution.

I realize that all this can not be brought about by a single stroke—by a one-day's revolution. But I know that all legislation in order to be really progressive and wholesome must move in that direction.

Legislation that does not tend to an increased measure of control on the part of society as a whole is not in line with the trend of economic evolution and can not last.

Legislation that interferes with the natural evolution of industry means the taking of backward steps and can not succeed.

Legislation that divides nations into armed camps, that creates useless navies, that puts up Chinese walls between peoples eager to trade with one another, is reactionary and can not endure.

The measure now under discussion is of small immediate concern to the working class. In itself it means no material change in the conditions of the working man or working woman. But because it is in line with social and political evolution, because it tends to destroy the old tariff superstition, because it tends to break down the barriers between nations and to bring into closer relations the various peoples of the world I shall support the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BERGER. Certainly. How much time have I, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. BERGER. Then I shall be glad to answer questions for 10 minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the workmen in this country are worse-off than at any time in the history of the world?

Mr. BERGER. I did not say anything of the kind. I said that the certainty of employment is smaller under the capitalist system than under any previous system.

Mr. KAHN. I understood the gentleman to say——

Mr. BERGER. Oh, no. The gentleman probably was not here from the beginning of my remarks. The wages are better in this country than in any other country in the world. I said that at the very beginning of my remarks, and explained why.

Mr. KAHN. Because I know in my own city of San Francisco the savings banks have deposits of $159,000,000, which are the savings of the working people of that community.

Mr. BERGER. Yes; and I know that you have had more strikes and more hell in San Francisco than in any other city I know of except Chicago. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Strikes?

Mr. BERGER. Yes; more labor troubles.

Mr. KAHN. San Francisco is to-day the best organized labor community in this country, and the workingmen there have had strikes only to the same extent as they have had them in any other section.

Mr. BERGER. And a few more.

Mr. KAHN. But they have been uniformly victorious, and at the present time we are getting along splendidly. We have not had any serious strikes for about three years.

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman, let me predict something. I have been in the labor and socialist movement for 27 years. The conditions in San Francisco, which the gentleman from California paints in such glowing colors, are the result of a quasi alliance between "big business" and a certain trade-union element, an alliance for which I would never stand. Let us see where this is going to lead to. It so far has brought more corruption than was ever known in any other city of the United States.

Mr. KAHN. The alleged corruption was under a former labor-union administration——

Mr. BERGER. I am not speaking about the labor unions. I am speaking about "big business" using the labor union as a political tool. [Applause.]

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BERGER. I do. [Applause.]

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Chairman, I did not quite understand the gentleman's allusion to me and to Vancouver and to the strike in Vancouver.

Mr. BERGER. If the gentleman will permit, I will read to you so that you can formulate your question just right. I said:

> The other day we listened to a fervid plea for the single tax, delivered on this floor by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GEORGE]. He paid particular attention to the introduction of this system in Vancouver, British Columbia, and painted in glowing colors the blessings that had followed it. And now comes the distressing news that Vancouver is in the midst of a general strike, the first of its kind in that city, involving every organized workman there. Evidently the single tax is not a substitute for bread and butter.

Mr. GEORGE. The single tax is a taxation question. I would like to understand—does the gentleman connect me up with that strike?

Mr. BERGER. Oh, no. [Laughter.] Whatever I may say about his theories, the gentleman from New York is innocent. The gentleman has nothing to do with that strike. I did not mean to say anything about it, but I wanted to show that the single tax does not improve labor conditions. It does not. Strikes are just as frequent in single-tax cities as in cities where they do not have the single tax. That is what I wanted to bring out.

Mr. GEORGE. I thank the gentleman. I feel very greatly enlightened.

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BERGER. Yes.

Mr. STANLEY. If I understood the gentleman, he said he was not opposed to the organization of trusts. Is that correct?

Mr. BERGER. I am not opposed to the organization of trusts any more than I am opposed to the Atlantic Ocean or to the Mississippi River, or, let us say, to anything that is a natural outcome of conditions. I explained that the trusts are the natural result of industrial evolution, and anything that is the natural outcome of an industrial development I am not opposed to.

Mr. STANLEY. That is, that it follows inevitably?

Mr. BERGER. That it follows inevitably.

Mr. STANLEY. Now, I want to ask the gentleman this: Does the gentleman favor the fixing of the price of commodities, of these immense organizations engaged in interstate trade, by the Government?

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman, I favor it as a first step. It is only primary. I understand Mr. Gary of the Steel Trust is in favor of that.

Mr. STANLEY. I understand so.

Mr. BERGER. And for the first time in my life Mr. Gary and I agree on anything. But I will also say it will not help much. It proves, though, that even the trust concedes that it has grown to such dimensions that it has become a quasi-public utility and that it is no longer a private business. The only solution, however, is the national ownership of the trusts.

Mr. STANLEY. As I understand the gentleman, he speaks of the trusts as a milestone in industrial evolution.

Mr. BERGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. STANLEY. In other words, the centralization of the immense wealth and energy of the steel business, for instance, in the hands at last of one man, and the centralization of the manufacture of wool in the hands of one man, and the manufacture of other textiles, like cotton, in the hands of one man, and the refining of sugar in the hands of one man——

Mr. BERGER. One concern.

Mr. STANLEY. I should say one person, whether corporate or individual—that this will in a short time place the body of the wealth of this country and the employment of all the labor in this country in the hands of a few persons, whether corporate or individual, and then the Government, as you say, should fix the price of the commodities of these great concerns, and it will be but a step from that until, instead of allowing them with the price fixed by the Government to operate for the benefit of a few individuals, they will be forced to operate for the benefit of all men?

Mr. BERGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. STANLEY. And that will be the easy step from the Government control as advocated by Judge Gary to Socialism as advocated by yourself?

Mr. BERGER. That will be a very natural step.

Mr. STANLEY. And an inevitable one.

Mr. BERGER. Nobody can regulate another man's business. I would hate to regulate your property. The regulation of other people's property is always a dubious thing to undertake. The trust, however, is willing to part with some of its rights of ownership. If I have a right to say how much you shall get for your horse, I have a share in that horse. As long as I can decide for how much you may sell your house, I have a share in that house. And as long as I can fix a price for a coat, I practically share in the ownership of that coat. Now that the trust offers an opportunity of ownership to the Government, the Government ought to accept. Complete ownership, however, is the final solution.

Mr. STANLEY. As I understand you, there is little difference between the position you take and the position taken, for instance, by the United States Steel Corporation, in this, that competition is a bad thing?

Mr. BERGER. It was not a bad thing in its day. In "big business" it is played out; it does not exist. It was a good thing as long as economic conditions required it.

Mr. STANLEY. You spoke in your address of the evils of competition and the bad effects of it——

Mr. BERGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. STANLEY. And suppose that these great industrial institutions, like the United States Steel Corporation, for instance, believe in abolishing competition and fixing the price by agreement or by law, the only difference between the trusts and the Socialists is that the trusts believe in having the Government run their business for the benefit of the persons who own them and you believe in having them run these great organizations for the benefit of all the people?

Mr. BERGER. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. FOWLER. I ask that his time be extended.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to ask what are the views of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] as to Government ownership?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER] has expired.

Mr. STANLEY. I ask permission to reply to the gentleman from Illinois, if I can hear him.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER].

Mr. CANNON. I wish to ask whether the gentleman from Kentucky is for Government ownership?

Mr. STANLEY. The gentleman from Kentucky is essentially an individualist. He differs as widely from Judge Gary as from the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER]. I am not a Republican; I am not a Socialist; I am a Democrat. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I believe in competition and the independence of the individual.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER] yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER]?

Mr. BERGER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FOWLER. I understood the gentleman to say, in the course of his argument, that the conditions had grown to such an extent that the capitalist of to-day thought more of his wealth than he did of the laborer or the family of the laborer?

Mr. BERGER. Yes; I said the average capitalist.

Mr. FOWLER. I was at a coal mine in my district last summer wherein there had been an explosion, and a man was sent down to investigate the result. When he came back the superintendent asked him, as the first question, "Were there any mules killed?" Is that what you mean by sizing up this situation?

Mr. BERGER. I did not know of that incident; but I could recite a good many incidents of a similar nature.

Mr. JACKSON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. BERGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACKSON. The gentleman was discussing the trust question. I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not true that what he means, under our present industrial system, is that where a man has used his property to produce a monopoly, under the common law and under our Constitution that man's property is devoted to the public use and that the Government has a right, this Congress has a right, to regulate those prices? And I will ask the gentleman further if our Supreme Court, in the cases of Munn against Illinois and the people against Budd, has not announced and confirmed that doctrine?

Mr. BERGER. Mr. Chairman, I do not know all the decisions of the Supreme Court. I am glad I do not. [Laughter.] However, whether the Supreme Court has so decided or not, the trusts are the natural outcome of industrial evolution, and our laws, our courts, and our Constitution will have to accommodate themselves to industrial conditions.

Mr. JACKSON. What I wanted to ask was this: Would it be anything contrary to the present doctrine of individualism, as we understand it in this country, if the courts and the legislature should regulate the prices of the products of men who violated the laws and used their property to produce a monopoly?

Mr. BERGER. Well, I will say that it would be contrary to the spirit of a régime of true individualism. Any interference by the Government with the rights of private property is socialistic in tendency.

Mr. JACKSON. I hope the gentleman is in favor of the Government enforcing true individualism.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. JACKSON. I move, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman be given time to answer my question.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the state of the country depends upon this. I yield one hour to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is recognized for one hour. The committee will be in order.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to participate in this discussion, for I frankly admit that Schedule K is one of the most intricate features of tariff legislation; and I, for one, was willing to wait until the Tariff Board, created by the last Congress, would be able to report to this Congress the result of its investigations regarding wool. But the other day the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] put into the RECORD a letter from a firm in Philadelphia, a portion of which I desire to read:

> Permit us, however, in connection with this subject of commerce, to suggest that the best thing that the Congress can do at this time for the advantage of American commerce is to adjourn and go home. All industrial trade in this country is paralyzed. Thousands of men, either partially or wholly idle, are walking the streets, and factories are closed or working on short time, whilst the several members of the Government * * * are spending the passing moment in a wild endeavor to secure a reelection to the particular office which he or they may be holding.

The suggestion, it seems to me, is fraught with a great deal of wisdom as well as much common sense, and I honestly believe that the entire country is of the impression that we are playing politics down here more than anything else. I feel confident that the country has already discovered that the gold which was promised by the Democracy prior to the last election has turned out to be but tinsel, and that the seeming virtue of the Democracy has turned out to be but smooth-faced hypocrisy. And I believe that the consideration of Schedule K, which is now in progress in this House, has convinced the country more than ever that such is the fact.

Conditions in the United States to-day are not unlike the conditions that prevailed here in 1892. At that time the people of this country were led to believe that they were unnecessarily and outrageously overtaxed. In the political campaign of that year the Democratic Party had placarded all the dead walls of the country with pictures to show that from the cradle to the grave the American citizen had to pay his tribute to this or that trust or combine that was raising prices on all kinds of commodities, and especially on the necessaries of life. I remember very well how the little infant was pictured as lying in a cradle that paid such and such a per cent ad valorem of tax; and when he grew up to be a schoolboy he paid on his books and his slate and his satchel, such and such a per cent ad valorem of taxes. When he grew up to be a young man and was about to be married, the wedding ring which he placed on the finger of his blushing bride was taxed at such and such a per cent ad valorem; when he finally died, he was laid in a coffin that was taxed at such and such a per cent ad valorem; and, last scene of all, when a tombstone was erected over his remains, it too was taxed at such and such a per cent ad valorem. Even in death, according to the placards, he could not escape the tariff tax.

The American people were led to believe it, and in 1892 they elected a Democratic House of Representatives, a Democratic President, and the Senate became Democratic for the first time in many years.

One of the other things that contributed to the success of the Democratic Party at that time was the schism that existed in the Republican Party. In fact, the Democrats never, in recent American history, have been able to elect their candidates for the important Federal offices in this country unless there was schism in the Republican ranks. That was the case in 1884, when Mr. Cleveland defeated Mr. Blaine. The Republican Party was divided. Otherwise Blaine would not have been defeated.

In 1892 there was a similar condition of affairs. Mr. Harrison, one of the ablest Presidents that ever graced the White House, was personally unpopular with the leaders of his party. He was not given that generous support that he should have received. In addition to that the people were led to believe, as I have just indicated, that they were being taxed to death under the McKinley tariff law, which had but recently been passed.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I should like to ask the gentleman to explain the cause of the split in the Republican Party at that time?

Mr. KAHN. It had reference to the personality of the candidate and nothing else.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Then it was not the result of vicious legislation?

Mr. KAHN. No; it was not. In 1884 Mr. Blaine was looked upon as one of the ablest and most popular leaders this country had ever had; but he had made powerful enemies during his public service, and they fought him bitterly in that campaign. They were known in the political history of that campaign as "mugwumps," to distinguish them from the Republican regulars, who were then called "stalwarts."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KAHN. I will yield for another question.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Was it not due to the fact that Mr. Blaine stood for reform measures that caused the other elements of the Republican Party to secure his defeat?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, I do not think it was anything of the kind. He was opposed by enemies whom he had made during his service in this House and in the Senate of the United States, and also as Secretary of State under President Garfield.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield to allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. KAHN. I will, certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Do you not admit the historical fact that Mr. Clay and Mr. Blaine were acknowledged and considered to be the greatest commoners of this Republic and the most popular men?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I think that is so.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And yet you say Blaine was defeated on account of personal unpopularity?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no; I did not say that. The gentleman misunderstood me. I say that Mr. Blaine was defeated by the machinations of enemies whom he had made during his service on this floor and on the floor of the Senate and also as a member of President Garfield's Cabinet. They became the "mug-wumps" of the Republican Party. That is the name by which they were known at that time.

Mr. Chairman, the Democracy had complete control of the administration of the affairs of this country in 1893, as a result of the election of 1892. They immediately began to take up tariff legislation, just as they are doing in this country to-day. Within a short time the industries of this country became paralyzed, the factories were shut down, and the working people were idle. It did not take the American people long to discover that they had been fooled, and the voters of the country in 1896, fully realizing the mistake that they had made in 1892, elected a Republican President, a Republican Senate, and again elected a Republican House.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I beg the gentleman's pardon for interrupting him, but I would like to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the defeat of the Democratic Party in 1896 was due to a split in that party?

Mr. KAHN. No; I do not think it was due to that. It was due to economic questions that the people of this country had studied during the three lean years that they were clamoring for bread; they concluded that the Democratic doctrine on the tariff was entirely wrong and that the Republican doctrine of protection to American industries was entirely right. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Is it not a fact that there was a split in the Democratic Party at that time?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; and there was also a split in the Republican Party; for the free-silver Republicans walked out of the Republican national convention even as the gold Democrats had broken away from the Democratic Party on the money issue in that campaign. So those defections balanced each other.

Since the time that the Republicans have been in complete control of the affairs of this Nation they have enacted such a mass of constructive legislation on so many important and diversified subjects that the period from 1897 to 1911 has no parallel for constructive and remedial legislation in the history of this country. Let me read a few of the important laws that have been written upon the statute books by Republican Congresses since 1897:

The Dingley tariff law, which blotted out a deficit and put a surplus into the Treasury and which rehabilitated the industries of this country. The employers' arbitration act. The national bankruptcy act. The law recognizing the independence of Cuba. The law for the annexation of Hawaii. The Alaskan criminal code. The gold-standard, refunding, and banking act. The incorporation of the Red Cross. The Spanish Treaty Claims Commission law. A Code of Laws for the District of Columbia. An act to establish the National Bureau of Standards. An act to provide a permanent Census Office. An act to repeal the war-revenue taxes. An act to provide for the construction of the Panama Canal. The Philippines government act. An act to expedite the antitrust cases. An act establishing the Department of Commerce and Labor. The Hepburn Anti-rebate Act. The Philippine coinage acts. An act exempting private property at sea, not contraband of war, from capture or destruction by belligerent powers. An act marking the graves of Confederate soldiers. An act creating a juvenile court for the District of Columbia. An act reorganizing the consular service of the United States. An act for the exemption of denatured alcohol from taxation. The first employers' liability act. An act for the admission of Oklahoma as a State. An act for the protection of the Alaskan fisheries. An act creating the Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization. The meat-inspection law. The pure food and drug law. An act limiting the hours of labor of railroad employees. The anti-pass act prohibiting the railroads from issuing free passes. The second employers' liability act. The tuberculosis registration act. A law for the grading of cotton and grain. A child-labor law for the District of Columbia. Compensation to United States employees for injuries received in the service of the Government. The law for the remission of the Chinese indemnity. An act to provide for improved accommodations for steerage passengers. The enlargement of the homestead act. The anti-bucketshop law. The recodification of the United States criminal laws. The Payne Tariff Act. The establishment of the Customs Court. The Philippine tariff act. The proposed income-tax amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The law for the extension of time to establish residence for homesteaders. An act to make United States bonds and certificates payable in gold coin. An act for the suppression of the white-slave trade. An act to further extend the employers' liability law. The uniform warehouse law in the District of Columbia. The law preventing the manufacture and sale of and transportation of adulterated insecticides. An act requiring railroads to report all accidents to the Interstate Commerce Commission. An act establishing the Bureau of Mines. An act establishing a commission of fine arts. An act in relation to the equipment of vessels and motor boats so as to prevent collisions. An act reorganizing the Lighthouse Service and establishing the Bureau of Lighthouses. An act creating the Court of Commerce. An enabling act for the admission of New Mexico and Arizona as separate States. An act providing for postal savings banks. An act providing for publicity of campaign contributions and prohibiting corporations from making contributions in elections. The national conservation act. Then there was the act allowing the issuing of bonds for the completion of irrigation projects and the Mann white-slave law. This is but a partial list of the many excellent laws that have been enacted during the last 14 years under Republican administrations. It is a record which has never been excelled by any party in the history of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.] The people of this country realize the enormous quantity of work and the statesmanlike quality of the work that has been accomplished by the Republican Party since 1897.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Is not the gentleman going to include also the act authorizing the Panama Exposition to be held in San Francisco? [Laughter.]

Mr. KAHN. Yes, Mr. Chairman; that was only one of the many other worthy things that have been done, but I felt too modest to speak about it. [Laughter.] But, as I stated before, history is repeating itself. In the last campaign many of the people of this country were led to believe that the Republican tariff was responsible for the high cost of living. They were again led to believe they were being taxed to death. They were also led to believe that the rules of this House were so stringent and their enforcement was so arbitrary that the the Members could not get up a proposition for discussion and action, no matter how meritorious it might be.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. In a moment. Then, too, many Republicans were met with most violent attacks in the last campaign at the hands of certain newspapers that waged a campaign for free wood pulp and free print paper. The muckrakers of the press at that time did everything they could to destroy the confidence of the American people in the Congress of the United States, and especially in the Republican side of the Congress. These were the principal causes that led to Republican defeat. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the rules were so stringent that a resolution was passed prohibiting a discussion of the Payne tariff bill on the floor of this House and if the gentleman did not vote for that resolution.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the Payne tariff law, as I recall it now, was fully discussed on the floor of this House. Under a special rule, as I recall it, the amendments that had been adopted by the Senate were passed without discussion. And I will tell my friend from Illinois that in adopting such a rule the Republicans were simply following the precedent established by the Democrats when they passed the Wilson bill. It is practically what the Democrats are doing now with this bill. They say that they are allowing a free discussion of this measure. So they are; but of what good is it? You gentlemen on the Democratic side have met in your caucus and you have decreed absolutely that no amendment shall be permitted to the pending bill. Practically every Member on that side of the House is a party to that caucus agreement, and although you will permit amendments to be offered, you have agreed beforehand that you will vote them down. Under such circumstances and conditions, what is the actual difference between the action of the Democratic side of the House at this time with respect to amendments to this tariff bill and the action of the Republican House in the last Congress? None whatever!

Mr. FOWLER. Is it not a fact that there was not a single speech made on the floor of this House from the time that the Payne bill was brought out of the committee until it was passed?

Mr. KAHN. Why, the gentleman is entirely mistaken. It was discussed here for days.

Mr. NYE. For weeks.

Mr. KAHN. Yes, for weeks; just as you are discussing this wool schedule now.

Mr. FOWLER. And I ask the gentleman if he did not vote for a resolution to pass that bill without discussion?

Mr. KAHN. Emphatically, no! No such resolution was considered. Mr. Chairman, in the meantime—that is, since the last election—the Payne law has been amply vindicated. Prior to the enactment of that law there was a large deficit in the Treasury of the United States. The Payne law has brought about a condition that gives us a surplus in the Treasury in place of a deficit.

When the Democrats captured this House in the last election it became evident that Mr. CLARK, the gentleman from Missouri, would be elected Speaker of this House, and I think I can safely say that every gentleman on this side of the House feels that so long as a Democratic Speaker had to be elected, the Democrats were exceedingly happy in the choice of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri. [Applause.] I have had opportunity to come in close contact with him, in connection with matters appertaining to Asiatic exclusion, and so far as his candidacy for the Presidency is concerned, the Democratic Party can find no better candidate anywhere in this country. [Applause.]

Mr. BARTLETT. May I suggest that it looks also that almost any worthy candidate that we might nominate next year will be elected to the Presidency.

Mr. KAHN. Well, I think the gentleman is drawing a long bow, and probably with him the wish is father to the thought. I think when the gentleman and his party go to the country next year the country will have realized fully how little the Democratic Party will have accomplished in the way of constructive legislation.

You will have disturbed business conditions so that hundreds of thousands of laborers and mechanics will be out of employment; you will have agitated the tariff to such an extent that nobody in this country in any manufacturing business will know just exactly where he stands; and you will not have accomplished a single other thing. Now, I desire to go ahead for a little while——

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest——

Mr. KAHN. Pardon me, but did the gentleman desire to ask a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. I was merely going to say——

Mr. KAHN. I do not desire any suggestions, but if the gentleman desires to ask any questions I shall be glad to answer them.

Mr. BARTLETT. I shall not impose on my friend's good nature.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WATKINS in the chair). Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. KAHN. For a question; not for any suggestion.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman says the Democratic Party is lacking in constructive statesmanship. I desire to ask the gentleman where all the constructive statesmanship came from prior to the Civil War?

Mr. KAHN. Well, that is ancient history; that is barred by the statute of limitation. [Applause on the Republican side.] There is a new class of statesmen at the helm in the Democratic Party, but the history of this country since 1861 shows that except in a single instance the Democratic Party has not placed upon the statute books of this country a single piece of legislation based upon constructive statesmanship. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FOWLER. I will ask the gentleman one further question and that is all——

Mr. KAHN. Well, if the gentleman desires to ask it.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the Democratic Party forced the Republican Party to enact one of its greatest measures, and that was the publication of campaign contributions?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, the gentleman certainly can not be serious about that. Why, the Republican Party enacted that——

Mr. FOWLER. To please the Democrats?

Mr. KAHN. Well, the Democrats, when they were offered an opportunity in this House to pass a genuine publicity bill, refused to do it. They seem to want the Republicans to show what they have expended in the campaign, but a majority of the Democrats seem to want their own expenses to lie hidden in musty pigeonholes in the offices of the secretaries of state in the Southern States. [Applause on the Republican side.] And I propose to fully exploit that very performance of the Democratic majority a little later on in my discussion.

Mr. FOCHT. If the gentleman will permit me, I would like to ask the gentleman from California, since he happened to be in a discussion with the gentleman from Illinois with respect to the history of the Democratic Party, whether it was not recently stated on the authority of the Democratic candidate for the presidency, Woodrow Wilson, that the Democratic Party up until the time of the war belonged to medieval history?

Mr. KAHN. I believe that is the fact, and I thank the gentleman for calling it to my attention. Now, when the present Speaker of this House was conducted to the Chair to be sworn in he made a statement to the House and to the country proclaiming the Democratic program for this session. Chief among the matters to be accomplished by this Democratic House were the following:

1. An honest, intelligent revision of the tariff downward. * * *
2. The passage of a resolution submitting to the States for ratification a constitutional amendment providing for the election of United States Senators by the popular vote. * * *
3. Such changes in the rules of the House as are necessary for the thorough and intelligent consideration of measures for the public good. * * *

And he went on to say:

I congratulate the House and the country, and particularly do I congratulate the members of the Committee on Ways and Means, upon the success of the important and far-reaching experiment of selecting committees through the instrumentality of a committee, an experiment touching which dire predictions were made and concerning the operation of which grave doubts were entertained, even by some honest reformers.

I shall have something to say about that in a few moments.

4. Economy in the public expense that labor may be lightly burdened. * * *
5. The publication of campaign contributions and disbursements before the election. * * *
6. The admission of both Arizona and New Mexico as States. * * *

It is certainly an ambitious program, to say the least. But no mention was made, however, of the bill for which the Congress was called together especially, namely, the Canadian reciprocity bill; perhaps because the distinguished gentleman from Missouri included that in his proposition to revise the tariff downward; or possbly it was because, emanating from a Republican President, the gentleman did not want to become sponsor for it. At any rate, he was entirely silent upon the subject. Now, quite a number of these important matters had been passed by Republican Houses on quite a number of occasions. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] asked me whether the Republicans did not steal Democratic campaign thunder. My impression is that the Democrats undertook to steal Republican campaign thunder, and I think I can demonstrate it before I get through.

Take, for instance, the resolution submitting a constitutional amendment to the various States for the election of Senators by direct vote of the people. In the Fifty-fifth Congress such an amendment passed the House of Representatives, a Republican body, on May 11, 1898, by a vote of 185 yeas to 11 nays. In the Fifty-sixth Congress, with a Republican House, on April 13, 1900, a similar resolution was passed by a vote of 242 yeas to 15 nays. In the Fifty-seventh Congress, on February 13, 1902, by a practically unanimous vote, no roll call having been had thereon at all, a similar resolution was passed by a Republican House. But not a single one of these resolutions to amend the Constitution of the United States contained a provision for the emasculation of section 4 of Article I of the Constitution. That section reads:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Of course, that provision gives the Federal Government authority to regulate elections for Senators and Representatives. But gentlemen high up in the councils of the Democratic Party are reported to have stated recently that unless that particular provision of the Constitution were repealed it is doubtful whether the southern legislatures would adopt such a constitutional amendment. It is the first time in the history of this kind of legislation that the Democrats have ever raised the point, so far as I have been able to discover. Their vote upon the constitutional amendments passed by Republican Houses of Representatives has been invariably for the amendment as submitted, without any reference to section 4 of Article I of the Constitution.

Now that the Democrats are in power again in the House of Representatives, they suddenly find that it will be practically impossible to adopt this constitutional amendment in the Southern States unless Federal control of elections, as provided for in that section, be entirely eliminated. Why? Because they are afraid of a force bill, so they say. Is not that a confession of their own weakness? It shows on its face that they do not hope to continue in power for any length of time or they would not conjure up such a senseless bugaboo. But I think the Northern and Western States will insist on retaining section 4 of Article I of the Constitution just as it now stands.

Much has been said about the new rules and some proposed new rules. Most of the rules that have amounted to anything in the change that has been accomplished were made in the last Congress. But how have they been enforced here? Has not the Democratic majority side-stepped them all through this session? On Monday we have a Unanimous Consent Calendar and also a Calendar of Motions to Discharge Committees. They are among the innovations to the rules made by the last House. In the present session they have been "more honored in the breach than the observance." The Democratic majority here have usually adjourned over from Friday or Saturday until Tuesday in order to avoid the Monday business. And when they have not adjourned over they have continued Saturday as a legislative day by taking a recess until Monday morning at an hour earlier than the regular session would ordinarily begin. Oh, but the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means says that that is done because the various committees and the chairmen of those committees were told that they were not to report out any legislation at this session at all, except such legislation as the Democratic caucus might agree on. Well, that is undoubtedly so. But here I notice on to-day's calendar a large list of motions to discharge committees, and the second on the list is the motion by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ANDERSON], who is a Member of the Democratic majority and who wants the Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged from further consideration of H. R. 767.

A bill granting pensions to certain enlisted men, soldiers and officers, who served in the Civil War and the War with Mexico, and amending the act of April 19, 1908, relative to the widows of soldiers, etc., of the Civil War.

That motion has been on the calendar since April 25, and it seems rather singular that the Democratic majority adjourns over from Saturday until Tuesday in order to deny the House an opportunity to take up this matter, which a Democratic Member, mark you—who presumably had heard of the instructions from the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means—had placed upon the Discharge Calendar in order that the bill might speedily be placed upon the calendar of this House for action. Of course, I do not suppose that these adjournments are taken in order to avoid taking up this bill. Oh, no!

In his message to the country, when he was sworn in, the Speaker of the House made a great point upon the splendid effect that the committee on committees was having upon this House. The plan has not been in operation very long in this House, but any Member who is interested in seeing how admirably it has worked thus far need only to refer to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this session in connection with the appointment of the members of the committee on the Sugar Trust investigation. If he desires to become convinced, I would commend him to read anywhere along pages 1269, 1270, 1271, 1272, 1291, 1292, 1293, 1294, 1295, 1302, 1306, and 1307 to see how admirably this new feature, that was heralded with so much approval, has worked out thus far.

Much was said about the economy in the expenses of the House—the economy that was proposed in the expenses for the government of the House.

I believe $188,000 was to be saved. I understand that a goodly portion of that was to be saved by the discharge of about half of the police force around this Capitol. Now, the House alone is not responsible for the appointment of that police force. The Senate has something to say about it, and I suppose that when the gentlemen made their announcement about this great saving they knew pretty well that the Senate would probably not consent to a reduction of that police force—a force which is absolutely necessary for the protection of the property of the United States and the safe conduct of not only the members of the United States Supreme Court and the members of both Houses of Congress, but also of those visitors who come from every section of the Union to see this splendid national Capitol building.

Much stress was laid too, by the Speaker, upon the bill providing for the publication of campaign expenses prior to election. The Republican Congress had already passed a law on the general subject and the bill which was recently passed by this House at this session, is simply an amendment or enlargement of that law, in order that campaign contributions and expenses should be published before election as well as after. I think it is an admirable law. But at the time the bill was under consideration here, I called the attention of the Democratic majority to the fact that the proposed measure did not entirely cover the purposes for which it was intended; and that if they were honest and sincere in their efforts to write upon the statute books of the United States a real publicity law, they would also have to include in that law a provision that statements of contributions to and expenditures by candidates for Congress at primary elections as well as at general elections should be filed with the Clerk of this House, in order that they might become, in very truth, public records. It is well known that in the South the principal election expenses are incurred at the primaries. After the primary, the successful candidate need not worry about the general election. He has no expense to speak of after the primary.

It was a very amusing and interesting occasion on this floor on the day when that question came up. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON] offered an amendment to the bill, providing that the campaign contributions to and expenses of candidates for Congress at the primaries, as well as at the general elections, should be filed with the Clerk of this House. There are many new Members on the Democratic side of the House. They thought it was a fair proposition, and they voted for it accordingly. The strong Democratic organization of this House was apparently defeated on that amendment by the votes of practically the united Republican minority plus a considerable number of votes from the Democratic majority. For the amendment carried and there was consternation in the Democratic ranks. I do not know what influences were used to secure a reversal of the vote. But that amendment provided that the United States district courts would have jurisdiction in the matter, and possibly some of the gentlemen from the South may have been induced to believe that if that condition were continued in the bill, a force bill might be introduced, which might even put the candidates for nominations in the primary elections at the mercy of the courts of the United States.

And then we saw a remarkable thing on this floor. The Democrats got together again, under the party lash, and they voted to strike out of the law the very amendment which, less than an hour before, had appealed to a goodly number of them as a splendid and proper piece of legislation.

The Democrats have made a great point about the admission of Arizona and New Mexico. Why, the enabling act for their admission was passed by a Republican Congress, and a Republican House passed a resolution for the admission of New Mexico at the last session of Congress. It failed in the Senate on account of lack of time.

In addition to these measures, the Democratic majority have passed through this House a "farmers' free-list bill." That was put through under instructions of the Democratic caucus. I doubt whether a single Member of the Democratic majority honestly expects to see it pass the Senate. And yet we have been disturbing the business of the country by taking up the time of the House with a measure of that kind.

The Canadian reciprocity bill has been passed by this House. A similar bill had passed the House in the last session of the Sixty-first Congress, a Republican House.

And now, Mr. Chairman, we have pending before us this bill for the revision of Schedule K as an additional feature of the Democratic program. I understand that the Tariff Commission, or rather the Tariff Board, will report its conclusions on the wool schedule on the 1st of next December. It might have been well for the Democratic majority to have waited until that time before they began the revision of this schedule. At that time they would at least have had some light upon the subject, for I understand that this bill, as reported to this House, was reported by the majority of the Ways and Means Committee without any additional testimony having been taken upon the various items contained in the schedule since the hearings upon the Payne bill were had.

To have waited a few months for that report from the Tariff Board would not have entailed a hardship upon the people of this country, so far as I know. The appropriation for this Tariff Board was, as I remember it, $250,000. Both the Speaker of this House and the Democratic leader on this floor, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] spoke and voted for the board. Now, if the report of this Tariff Board on the subject of the wool schedule will be of such little value that it will not be worth while to wait for it, then both of these gentlemen have helped to vote away a large sum of money out of the Public Treasury for an entirely useless purpose. But I believe the report will be worth waiting for. I believe the country expects us to wait for it, in order that we may have full information upon which to predicate our action regarding this much-discussed Schedule K. And I believe the House ought to wait for this report.

I notice that under the provisions of the bill ad valorem duties are generally substituted for specific rates. I believe that to be a distinct step backward. Ad valorem rates have led constantly to undervaluations and frauds. There is ample testimony on that score. But it is universally admitted that the schedule has many intricacies, and it seems the height of folly to attempt its revision without full knowledge upon the subject.

The distinguished leader of the minority on this floor [Mr. MANN] pointed out in a very able speech the other day that practically every man on the Democratic side who has spoken on this bill has made the assertion that he believes in a tariff for revenue only. That has been the Democratic position since the Democratic Party, or a large portion of it, broke away from absolute free trade—a tariff for revenue only; and though they have been defeated upon that issue time and again before the American people, they have always tried, when they got the opportunity, to revitalize the corpse and bring it to life once more, to the great detriment of both the labor and the capital interested in the continued operation of the industries of the country.

I have listened with some interest to the discussion on the tariff questions that have come before this House within the last few weeks. Almost every Member on the Democratic side of this House has taken the position that the tariff is responsible for the trusts. Now, I think if they were to investigate that matter, they would realize that they are entirely and absolutely wrong upon that question. The trust movement is one of the phenomena of modern business and commercial advancement, and trusts exist in free-trade England even more numerously than they do in this country. Mr. H. W. Macrosty, who is to-day a recognized authority on English trusts, in his able and highly instructive work on "The Trust Movement in British Industries," says:

> But the encroachment on the realm of free competition steadily progresses, though not at the feverish speed of six or seven years ago. We have to reckon with the probability, to use no stronger term, though one might without exaggeration say the certainty, that we are in the early stages of the evolution of the form which industry will take in the future. * * * The special reason for the formation of an amalgamation is always the existence of destructive competition, the result of a surplus of productive capacity.

And again, on page 335 of his work, he says:

> It is safe to assume that British trusts keep prices, on the whole, somewhat above what they would be under free competition.

Now, those trusts to which he refers are organized in free-trade England, and yet there, according to this recognized authority, they keep prices above what they would be if there were free competition.

Dr. Herman Levy, of Heidelberg, Germany, who has spent several years in England studying the trust question there, in his "Monopole, Kartelle, und Trusts," published at Jena in 1909, which, I believe, is one of the latest books that has been published on this important subject, says:

> It was presumed that owing to her free-trade policy, as well as her location on the sea, which would tend to prevent high freight charges, the formation of trusts for the purpose of raising prices would be found impossible. * * * But this presumption has been destroyed by the actual development of existing English monopolistic amalgamations.

Mr. Chairman, England has had trusts and monopolies for centuries. As early as 1771 a combination was formed by the colliery owners north of Newcastle on Tyne under a system which they called "Limitation of Vend." The object was to keep up the price of coal in London and to prevent competition by sea or canal, and at a later period by rail. The prices charged were very excessive and burdensome. Between 1800 and 1836 there were no less than five investigations at the hands of committees of Parliament, and an interesting report on the coal trade was published in the latter year by one of those committees. The report called attention to the fact that at that time a great majority of the owners of collieries north of the Tyne had combined for the purpose of controlling the London market by limiting output and raising prices.

That was in 1836. The trust had been in operation since 1771.

The report states that great quantities of poor coal were forced on the market by this combination at exceedingly high prices. It was but a repetition of former reports, but the combination existed for upward of 70 years in free-trade England before it was finally dissolved.

Nor did this combination have easy sailing. Its history is rather interesting in the study of the development of trusts. R. Eddington, in 1813, published "A Treatise on the Coal Trade." He told how, as new collieries were opened south of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, keen competition ensued between the old fields and those more recently developed. The fight was long, hard, and eventful. It was prosecuted for the purpose of determining which set of collieries should control the market and supply the public, those north of the Tyne or those south of that river. But after this quarrel had lasted for several years the parties to it found it advisable to pool or combine their interests, regulate the output of each colliery, and to extort such prices as might suit the convenience of the monopolists.

The copper industries of Cornwall and Anglesea in the eighteenth century were the greatest in the world, and they showed every symptom of having been organized into a trust. In 1785 the Cornish Metal Co. was organized by a syndicate of mine owners and smelters who controlled seven-eighths of the copper output of Cornwall. The entire output of Anglesea was in the hands of one man, and he, with the Cornish Metal Co., formed a trust to put up the prices of copper and to limit the output. The Birmingham copper consumers at that time realized that they were being squeezed by this trust. They organized a counter syndicate which they called the Birmingham Mining and Copper Co., and began to buy up copper properties, put up smelters, and erect villages for their operatives in order to get them away from the trust. Finally they actually did break up the trust, but the industry remained in such few hands that these few owners would get together periodically to limit the output and fix prices, just as the trust had done. Thus Birmingham was for years under the control of a copper trust.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I will yield one-half hour more to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. As early as 1832 Charles Babbidge, in his "Economy of Manufacturers," called attention to a combination of certain organizations against the public, and spoke particularly of the monopolistic amalgamations of gas and water companies. He discussed the combination of the colliery owners, about which I have been speaking, and he also referred to the booksellers' monopoly that was in existence at that time. And so we see that free-trade England right straight along has been the very "mother of trusts."

In 1901 the Industrial Commission, which had been authorized by the Congress of the United States to investigate questions pertaining to immigration, to labor, to agriculture, to manufacturing, and to business, made a report which is exceedingly interesting in the light of present-day history. I will read a little from it, and then put the long list of English trusts in the RECORD. In 1896, J. & P. Coats (Ltd.) was organized with a capitalization of £7,498,680. In November, 1897, the English Sewing Cotton Co., embracing 15 firms, was organized with a capitalization of £3,000,000. December, 1897, the Yorkshire Dyeware & Chemical Co., embracing 10 firms, was organized with a capitalization of £360,000. In May, 1898, the Linen Thread Co. was organized by nine firms with a capitalization of £2,000,000. In 1898 the Fine Cotton Spinners and Doublers' Association was organized. It embraced 40 firms and was capitalized at £6,750,000. These are the other trusts or combinations reported by the Industrial Commission:

Years.	Month.	Names.	Number of firms.	Capital.
1898....	January	United Turkey Red Co	3	£1,200,000
1898....	May	British Dyewood & Chemical Co	4	570,000
1898....		American Thread Co. (Ltd.)	13	3,720,000
1898....	December	Bradford Dyers' Association (Ltd.)	30	4,750,000

1900....	December	G. & J. Baldwin and Partners (Ltd.) (fingering and knitting wools and hosiery yarns)	6	850,000
1900....	do	Leeds and District Worsted Dyers' and Finishers' Association	10	180,000
1900....	do	Wall Paper Manufacturers (Ltd.)	30	4,200,000
1900....		Bleachers' Association (Ltd.)	53	8,250,000
1900....		Associated Portland Cement Manufacturers (agreement with four other firms)	34	8,000,000
1900....		British Oil and Cake Mills	17	2,250,000
1900....		Rivet, Bolt & Nut Co. (practically all the manufacturers in Scotland)	15	550,000
1900....		Wholesale News Agents Association (all firms in Bradford, Leeds, and Sheffield)	32	290,000
1900....	July	The Extract Wool & Merino Co. (Ltd.)	7	340,000
1887....		Bath Stone Firms (monopolize all but one; since acquired Portland Stone)	7	338,000
1888....		The Salt Union		4,200,000
1891....		United Alkali Co. (Ltd.)	49	8,500,000
1895....		Liverpool Warehousing Co. (Ltd.)	6	1,050,000

The last four concerns belong to an earlier period, but the total aggregation of capital which they helped to swell to £91,946,680 is probably understated. Several of the trusts have recently absorbed other businesses and issued more debenture stock. The list could also be extended. I have stopped at well-organized combinations—concrete examples of the trust type. There is, for instance, the National Telephone Co., with its £7,000,000 capital, but it is just about to lose its monopoly. The British Lustreing Syndicate, formed to work patents applied to the textile industry, is a monopoly to keep up prices. There is a strong combination of Scotch paraffin oil companies; the Edinburgh distillers' companies, with 10 firms absorbed. The Lace Curtain Manufacturers' Association has been registered with a capital of £2,000,000, and the Lace Dressers and Finishers' Association, with £1,000,000, but not yet launched.

The trusts in England are exceedingly numerous, and a perusal of that report, made by the Industrial Commission in 1901, at this time will prove exceedingly interesting to the Members of this House and to the country generally. In addition to those enumerated, Macrosty mentions the following in the wool industry: In 1900 the Union Velvet Cutters' Association, embracing four firms, with a capitalization of £200,000 was organized. In 1900 the Extract Wool & Merino Co., with a capitalization of £270,000, was organized. In 1900 the English Fustian Manufacturing Co. was organized at Todmorden and Hebden Bridge. Eighty per cent of the firms engaged in this industry organized this trust, with a capital of £500,000. In 1904 Mitchells, Ashworth, Stansfield & Co., embracing eight firms of felt manufacturing concerns, organized a trust, with a capital of £674,646. In 1904 the Wool Combers (Ltd.) was organized—another trust—with a capital of £585,000. In all, there were 17 combinations in the textile industries alone between 1896 and 1900—17 trusts in free-trade England in the textile industries alone—in four years. Yet gentlemen on the other side of this House constantly repeat the assertion that the tariff is responsible for the trusts.

Now, this matter of trusts in comparatively recent years has been engaging the attention of the statesmen and the economists of the world. Neither England nor this country is alone under the domination of trusts. France, Germany, and Austria all have a system which is practically identical with the trust system. They call it the "kartelle." The only difference between the trusts and the kartelle is this: The trust combines a number of companies, or corporations, or associations, or partnerships in a single organization, and the component parts lose their individual identity. In the German system each one of the component parts retains its identity, but the selling arrangements are made by the members of a special organization, called the kartelle. It makes the prices, demarks the lines of territory which any one of the organizations comprising the kartelle may enter, and also limits the output of the particular commodity it controls. In 1904 Brentano, a distinguished German economist, made this statement, and I call it to the attention of the Democratic membership of this House and also to the attention of my Republican colleagues. He said:

Competition belongs to the past. We live in an age of ever-broadening monopoly.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this proposition, if it be true—and all indications point that way—is a new problem for the statesmen of this period to grapple with. Whether publicity is the remedy, I do not know. Whether government control will meet the situation, I do not know. Whether the entire breaking up of these combinations is the best thing that can be done, I do not know. But the fact remains that statesmen, economists, and thinkers in every one of the progressive nations of the earth are giving their attention to this all-important subject.

Instead of standing here upon this floor and denouncing the Republican Party because that party has placed on the statute books a tariff law which not alone has given new impetus to the industries of this country, but which also has brought enormous revenues into the public coffers, it would be well for the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber to heed the suggestion of the Philadelphia firm to adjourn and go home. In the interim between now and next December let them study this all-important question of the trusts in its every phase and aspect, in order that they may be able at the regular session of Congress to bring in a measure which will be in the nature of constructive legislation on this important subject. In that way they may bring honor and glory upon themselves and their party. They may then acquire the confidence of the country. In that way they can perform an actual service to the people. But to bring in this piecemeal tariff legislation, which helps nobody in this country, and to keep up this tariff tinkering, which simply tends to paralyze the country's industries to the detriment of hundreds of thousands of mechanics and laborers who are dependent upon those industries for their daily bread, is, to my mind, an utterly useless and senseless performance.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BATHRICK. Does the gentleman assume that the high tariff which has been in force by reason of legislation passed by the Republican Party has not assisted in producing the great combinations of business in this country?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think so, any more than the low tariff or no tariff of England has been responsible for the formation of great combinations in that country. As a matter of fact, if the gentleman will permit me, in looking up this subject the other day I found that several of the American trusts were organized and financed in part by the English trusts which exist in that free-trade country.

Mr. BATHRICK. Does not the gentleman think that the elimination of foreign competition by reason of a prohibitive tariff enabled our American manufacturers to combine more easily with the domestic competition?

Mr. KAHN. The tariff in this country has no more to do with the formation of the trusts in this country than no tariff in England has anything to do with the formation of the trusts in that country. This is the industrial situation all over the world: The men who have large amounts invested in industries are trying to avoid keen competition. They have discovered that competition, and especially the brand which is known as "cutthroat competition," has been ruinous in times past.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. In a moment.

As I was saying, they have found out that competition wherever it has become exceedingly keen has resulted in what they call "cutthroat competition," practically a ruination of industry, and it was in order to prevent that kind of competition that combinations have been made in England, in free-trade England, even before they were made in our protected United States. Discussing this very phase of the trust question, McCrosty writes:

Alike in protected and unprotected markets, free competition becomes cutthroat, prices fall, and overproduction ensues in the wild effort of producers to reduce costs by a larger output.

Now I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Does the gentleman claim there is any such organization in England or in any other country in the world as the Steel Trust?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; England has its parallels, though not on so large a scale; and if the gentleman will take the trouble to read Macrosty upon the subject he will find in England an exact counterpart of the Steel Trust in this country, and he will probably find the same thing in Germany, too.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. But there is no other organization which has been able to put a blanket mortgage on the country by the issuance of $400,000,000 of watered stock and compel the people to pay prices that enables them to pay dividends upon that stock.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, the gentleman has not read much upon this subject, because he would find that one of the complaints in free-trade England is the watering of stock. There they have put it into the trust under the designation of "good will." The good will of each concern that goes into the combine is rated at so much. This good will is nothing but water. It has no tangible existence, and it has been used as water in the English combines.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. But the gentleman is not answering my question. I do not think anybody has ever claimed that the civilized world from the beginning of its history down to the present day has furnished a parallel to the Steel Trust, where, shielded behind the tariff wall, it compels the people of this country to pay dividends upon an admittedly watered stock.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, the gentleman has made a statement rather than asked a question, but I will say this to the gentleman, that probably in amount the Steel Trust has the greatest quantity of water that has ever been put into a trust; but the principle remains the same. The same thing is occurring constantly in free-trade England, where trusts have been organized for upward of 100 years; yes, for 150 years, almost. But there the water has been put into the trusts in the shape of what they call "good will." Whenever a combination is effected each concern that enters the combine puts in, as part of its assets, a claim for "good will" of that particular concern. If 40 concerns enter the trust and each one gets an allowance for "good will" my friend will readily perceive that the quantity of water will be very considerable. Why, the history of the English trusts discloses the fact that by reason of the excessive quantity of water in the consolidations which were made at the outset of the present trust movement in the early eighties, they had considerable difficulty in making a remunerative rate of interest on their investments. But eventually they got around to it, and the trusts in free-trade England are paying good dividends to-day on "water," and more of them are constantly being organized with a good percentage of "water."

Now, let me read this, which is very interesting. I read from the Daily Consular and Trade Report, page 173, of Tuesday, July 19, 1910. This is very interesting, because this trust, or this combination, was organized comparatively recently in free-trade England.

GLASS-BOTTLE MAKERS' COMBINE—BRITISH INDEPENDENT INTERESTS AND NEGOTIATIONS WITH COMBINE.

Consul Benjamin F. Chase, of Leeds, describes the present status of the glass-bottle industry in England and the continued efforts to complete the trust:

In 1907 a combination of many of the leading glass-bottle makers of the United Kingdom was formed for the alleged purpose of safeguarding British interests and regulating the trade. This combine purchased the British patents of the Owen automatic machine from an American syndicate for $973,300, with a further expenditure of $146,000 in testing its utility.

Thirteen firms, with factories in London, Newport, Wakefield, Hunslet, Castleford, Thornhill, Lees, Knottingley, and other places, many being in Yorkshire, declined to join this combine and operate independently. These latter concerns were able to continue business by having customers who believed that if all went into a combine prices would go up, because the combine has an agreement with Continental makers by which they are not to sell in the United Kingdom at a price lower than agreed.

Some time ago, at a meeting of the combine and the independent makers, the latter offered to join in a selling-price agreement, but not in the purchase of the machine, but would not agree to declare the output for the previous six months, and not to extend the works to exceed that output for 10 years, nor to the condition that no maker should sell to another not a member of the combine.

Later the Glass Blowers' Union held a meeting at Leeds, and it was represented to them that unless these 13 firms joined the combine and withdrew their competition the prices of bottles, and consequently wages, would have to be reduced. The union then decided to force the independents into the combine, and for that purpose gave notice that unless the agreement were signed they would quit work, which they did at the expiration of the time fixed.

Some of the independents agreed to the conditions and joined the combine and their laborers returned to work. Some still refuse, and the strike continues against them. This is possibly the first time a labor union has declared a strike to force the employer to join a combine which proposes to control a trade and create a monopoly by agreement and otherwise.

There are about 230 heads of families among the glass workers of Leeds who work an average of 5 days of 9¼ hours, or 46¼ hours per week. The bottle makers or finishers on this time receive 36s. ($8.76) per week; blowers, 34s. ($8.27); and gatherers, 29s. ($7.05).

One of the most important questions that Congress will have to deal with is how to defeat these combines. Many gentlemen on the other side of the House, and at least one on this side, have suggested that in order to defeat them we ought to pass a law to put upon the free list the goods manufactured abroad which compete with trust-made goods manufactured in this country. Let me say to these gentlemen that the history of the formation and the organization of the trusts shows that there is scarcely a single instance where the trust controls the entire output of any commodity. There is always some competition, competition at the hands of independent manufacturers, who refuse to join the trusts. To allow the foreign manufacturers, whose goods compete with similar goods made by trusts in this country, to send their wares into the American market free of duty, would not hurt the trusts. You would be hurting the independent manufacturers all over this country who are actually competing with the trusts, and who are trying to make an honest, honorable living. You want to cure a corn by cutting off the leg at the knee.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAY in the chair). Will the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. KAHN. I yield, certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman will remember that about two years ago there was a good deal of feeling on the floor of this House, expressed with a good deal of passion, to the effect that if we took the duty off of petroleum and its products, great hardship would result to the independent refiners. Now, as a matter of fact, great hardship did not result to the independent refiners; and does not that single instance, happening here within the last two years, absolutely refute the present position of the gentleman?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think the conclusions of the gentleman are entirely correct. I think he is misinformed. I received a letter from a gentleman in San Francisco only three days ago with respect to the use by the War Department of fuel oil rather than coal, and in his letter to me he told me absolutely—and he is one of the independent producers—that they can not readily dispose of their oil. They are in bad shape, and the oil companies are not doing as well as they ought to be doing.

Mr. DONOHOE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. DONOHOE. Does that relate to fuel oil?

Mr. KAHN. Yes, sir; to fuel oil and oil generally produced in California.

Mr. DONOHOE. Does not the gentleman know that the fuel oil is a drug on the market by reason of the fact that gasoline is extracted in such large quantities?

Mr. KAHN. Fuel oil evidently does not have the ready sale that it had a few years ago. With respect to gasoline, the independent producers on the Pacific coast claimed that they would suffer the severest kind of competition if the differential were not continued, because steamers belonging to the Standard Oil Co. would occasionally put in at San Francisco and bring the gasoline or benzine from foreign ports to that port at such an exceedingly low rate that the local manufacturers could not compete.

Mr. DONOHOE. But the fact remains that gasoline is in enormous demand for gas engines, and because that part of the oil is used so much now, the fuel oil is in abundance.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, whether the oil from the California fields produces that gasolene which the gentleman refers to I do not know. But I know this, that most of the oil wells in California, or a very large percentage of them, are controlled by independent producers. They do not belong to the trust, and they are having just now a mighty hard time of it to dispose of their production.

Mr. CANNON. Just at that point; I recollect the legislation which allows the oil of the world to come into the United States free, notwithstanding that Russia, and perhaps other portions of the world, charge the oil of the United States a duty. As I understand it, the Standard Oil Co. utilized American oil in the markets of all the world before that legislation and they have done so since that legislation was passed.

I was one that believed that we should treat foreign countries in trade in oil as they treated us, expressing the fear that it would put it in the power of oil combinations, Standard Oil as well as other combinations, to utilize the Mexican product or utilize any future discovered or existing product in our markets free and unduly compete with home-produced oil, especially that produced by the independent companies. But if the gentleman will allow me, the cry of "Down with the octopus" was so great and the political stress of the hour was so great that gentlemen tore passion to tatters in claiming to give the Standard Oil Co. a black eye. I spoke then as a Representative, in connection with my colleague, Dr. FOSTER, of Illinois, of an oil-producing country, operated by independent producers, producing more oil than was produced altogether in the United States east of a line drawn north and south from the rise to the outflow of the Mississippi River.

Mr. KAHN. I remember the circumstances that the gentleman speaks of exceedingly well, and I am proud of the fact that I was one of the few Members on the floor of this House who voted with the gentleman from Illinois at that time.

Mr. CANNON. And if the gentleman will allow me further, I will say in that connection that the great leader of the Democratic Party, Mr. Bryan, did me the honor to come into my district and denounce me, on account of that vote, as a protector of trusts. Fortunately the oil was produced there, and the independent producers lived there, and his visit to my district added to a very good majority that I had. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman from California, or any other gentleman on the floor of the House, able to show any benefit to any consumer in the country by reason of taking off the tariff from oil?

Mr. KAHN. The consumer has not received a particle of benefit.

Mr. MANN. There was a concrete illustration of the policy of free trade. I do not know myself, but what effect has it had, and what benefit has it been to anybody?

Mr. KAHN. I am glad the gentleman has asked the question, because it simply goes to illustrate a number of things that have been constantly harped on by gentlemen on the other side with respect to the reduction of duties.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. KAHN. One moment, if you please. Take the so-called reciprocity laws that have been enacted and put into effect by this Government. It was always contended that they were going to reduce prices to the consumer, and it is being contended now that the act just recently passed by this House on the subject of Canadian reciprocity is going to reduce prices to our consumers. Cuban reciprocity has been referred to as being a great success. The output of the Cuban sugar fields has grown from 600,000 tons in the year in which Cuban reciprocity was enacted to 1,800,000 tons a year at the present time, and yet sugar has not been reduced in price to the ultimate consumer of this country a fraction of a cent. The 20 per cent differential has gone almost entirely into the pockets of the Sugar Trust. The 20 per cent differential that was taken off Cuban tobacco has gone almost entirely into the pockets of the Tobacco Trust, and the consumers have not benefited from it by a fraction of a cent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. KAHN. I will yield in a few moments. The same is true with respect to the Hawaiian reciprocity treaty. Sugar came in from Hawaii under that treaty absolutely free, and yet it did not reduce the price of sugar to the ultimate consumer a fraction of a cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman from California desire more time?

Mr. KAHN. I would like just a little more time.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I want to make this further statement, namely, that since free trade with Porto Rico has been established the price of sugar and the price of tobacco have not been reduced a fraction of a cent to the consumers of this country. Since a certain quantity of sugar and a certain quantity of cigars have come into this country free from the Philippines, those commodities have not been reduced a fraction of a cent to the consumers of this country. This world movement of combinations of which I spoke a few moments ago controls these outputs, and even in Canada such combinations will be organized if they do not already exist there, and they will control the prices and the outputs there, just as they control the prices and the outputs in free-trade England, just as they control the prices and the outputs here, and just as they control the prices and the outputs in Germany, in France, in Austria, and in all the other great countries of the earth.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the gentleman states plainly that the removal of the duty on oil has not reduced the price of oil to the consumer in this country?

Mr. KAHN. Not a particle.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman also states that the reduction or removal of the duty on sugar would not reduce the price of sugar to the consumer in the United States.

Mr. KAHN. I have always been willing to learn something from the teachings of history, and history discloses the fact that those laws which heretofore have been enacted reducing the duty on sugar have not resulted in reducing the cost of the commodity to the ultimate consumer a fraction of a cent.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. One more question. While this process has been going on with regard to oil, and might go on with regard to sugar, and while the consumer has derived absolutely no benefit, the Government loses the revenue?

Mr. KAHN. Exactly.

Mr. PROUTY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. PROUTY. Do I understand the gentleman to say or to argue that it is of no use to the Government to undertake to control or limit the operations of trusts?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, the gentleman has entirely misunderstood me. The gentleman was probably not in the House when I spoke on that subject. I believe that it is the province of the Government to do all it can to regulate and control these things. It is an interesting and a complex question. We here in the United States are not the only ones that are bothered about it. Free-trade England is bothered about it; Germany, France, and Austria all have their troubles from it, and their statesmen as well as their economists are busy trying to solve it. In those countries, however, the opposition to the trusts is not as great among the masses as it is in this country.

But the statesmen of those countries are studying it and trying to devise means to secure some control of these monopolistic combinations; and I stated that I believe the Democratic majority in this House might better occupy its time in studying this all-important question, so that by next December that majority may bring in a bill, dictated by wise and sound and constructive statesmanship, that will help to regulate these combinations, rather than be frittering away the time, as it is now doing, in disturbing business conditions and throwing thousands of workmen out of employment. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. DONOHOE. Has not the consumption of fuel oil increased in the last few years very much?

Mr. KAHN. I can not say as to that. I am not informed.

Mr. DONOHOE. I am credibly informed by oil dealers that the present price of fuel oil is the lowest in the last 10 years.

Mr. KAHN. Fuel oil has been under the control of the trust for many years, and while I for one reprobate as heartily as any gentleman on this floor the actions of the trust in trying to throttle competition and drive competitors to the wall, and while I believe such efforts should be most severely punished, nevertheless the gentleman must admit that since they have controlled the industry, as a general rule, the price of oil has been gradually going down lower and lower in this country. If the price of fuel oil, as stated by the gentleman, be lower than it has been at any time in the last 10 years it bears out that very fact.

Mr. PROUTY. By their efforts or in opposition to them?

Mr. KAHN. They probably may have done it of their own volition in some instances. And where they have done so they ought to be given credit for it. I deprecate as much as the gentleman does, or as much as any Member on this floor does, the effort of any trust that tries to drive competitors to the wall and that tries to ruin those who would go into the same field of industry, and I would go as far as any Member in securing the punishment of the offenders.

Mr. PROUTY. Do you think any trust was ever formed with the idea, purpose, or object of lowering prices?

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman had been here when I was making the earlier part of my speech, he would have discovered that I said repeatedly that these trusts and combinations were organized in free-trade England as well as in this country and in other countries for the express purpose of raising prices, of limiting output, and of stifling competition.

Mr. PROUTY. Does it not logically follow that if they are organized for the purpose of increasing prices they never lower them unless something else makes them do it?

Mr. KAHN. I do not follow the gentleman's logic entirely. I think that, as a general rule, they are compelled to lower prices; but there may have been times when they have lowered prices of their own accord.

I believe that the combinations want to get all that they can by reason of their combination. They are organized and combined for that purpose, and yet I believe there have been times when by reason of new conditions they have found that they were able to reduce their prices below those which prevailed when the combination was formed.

Mr. PROUTY. The part of your statement that I wished to call attention to was this: You stated that we should give them credit for reducing prices. Do you believe that they have ever voluntarily, for the benefit of the public, reduced a price?

Mr. KAHN. They are not organized for the benefit of the public. They are organized for the benefit of themselves.

Mr. PROUTY. Why should we give them credit for it then?

Mr. KAHN. I believe there have been times when, by reason of reduced cost of production by the discovery of new processes, some combinations have at times reduced prices. That is my impression. They do not do it often, but when they do they should be given credit for it.

Mr. PROUTY. Do you think they would ever voluntarily reduce the price, if there was not something else compelling them to do it?

Mr. KAHN. That is a matter of opinion, anyhow. We can not look into the minds of the people in the trust; but I want to say to the gentleman and to this House that nothing can be accomplished by railing at them. What we ought to do is to try to regulate or control them, and the sooner that is done—it is the part of wisdom and statesmanship to do it—the better it will be.

Several Members rose.

Mr. KAHN. I will yield now to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Without taking sides on the trust question, will the gentleman answer whether the people themselves would prefer to take the old-fashioned stagecoach to the railroad station at the old-fashioned prices, or take the trolley car at modern prices?

Mr. KAHN. I can not answer for all the people. There are some that I suppose would prefer to go in the old stagecoach, but for myself I had rather take the trolley car.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. One more question. Assuming that oil was sold 40 years ago in Pennsylvania for 60 cents a gallon and is sold to-day for 12 cents or thereabouts per gallon, through organization of those who made the refining business profitable, would the public prefer to go back to the old method of obtaining oil at 60 cents per gallon or pay 12 cents per gallon under modern conditions?

Mr. KAHN. As one of the public, I should say give me the 12-cents-a-gallon oil.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman answer one more question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Assuming what is a fact within my own recollection, that sugar, brown sugar at that, put up in untied bags, stamped out by the feet of West Indian negroes, cost 13 or 14 cents a pound carried home by the purchaser 35 years ago, would the public prefer to return to that system or obtain refined sugar that comes from the organized system of purification to-day for 5 or 6 cents a pound?

Mr. KAHN. The housewife, I think, would prefer the 5-cents-a-pound sugar.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman know of any one man, farmer, manufacturer, laborer anywhere in the United States, or anywhere in the world, who does not get the most he can for a day's labor or for a bushel of corn or a gallon of oil or any other product?

Mr. KAHN. Of course I do not.

Mr. CANNON. Then the gentleman, I take it, believes that civilization rests on the hustle of the unit?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. That men from the standpoint of self-interest obtain what they lawfully can, and if there be combinations that are oppressive and monopolistic it is the duty, so far as we have the power in regulating commerce among the States, to abolish such monopolies?

Mr. KAHN. To abolish them if we can, and to regulate and control them, at all events. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. I quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman, I take it, would rather go onward and upward than backward and downward, in this present day and generation.

Mr. KAHN. Yes; most decidedly.

Mr. DONOHOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. DONOHOE. The gentleman from California is aware of the fact, I suppose, that the proposed glass combine in England is based on a monopoly of patents?

Mr. KAHN. The glass factories in that combination have the patents, it is true, but they have been trying to force their independent competitors into the trust. According to the report of our consul, they have a trust, and the trust is trying to control prices there. The independent manufacturers have given them very keen competition, and because of the keenness of that competition, notwithstanding the fact that the trust has these patents, it has been trying to force the independent concerns into this combine, but not with the success that it had hoped for nor which it anticipated.

Mr. DONOHOE. But the men who have not the patented machinery have no show.

Mr. KAHN. Evidently the independent producers there have a pretty good show, or the combine that controls the patents would not be so anxious to force them into the trust, or of going to the extent of getting the working people of the independents to strike in order to force the independents into the combine. That is pretty good evidence that the independents are making headway against the trust.

Mr. DONOHOE. The gentleman is aware also that the German manufacturers who have been asked to join the combine have also the patented machinery?

Mr. KAHN. The combine exists outside of England to this extent: The English manufacturers have an agreement with the German manufacturers that the German manufacturers will not send their products into England to compete with the products of the English combine. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I stated that the Democrats had not been very successful in the rôle of constructive statesmanship. Let me give the committee a specific case of incompetency in that direction. In the Fiftieth Congress, when the House was Democratic, the Committee on Manufactures undertook to investigate this trust question. The committee held extended hearings on the Sugar Trust, the Standard Oil Trust, the Whisky Trust, and the Cotton-Bagging Trust. Its investigations were extended through practically the entire life of that Congress, and in the closing days of the second session Mr. BACON, from that committee, submitted a report (H. Rept. 4165), which reads in part as follows:

> They respectfully report that the number of combinations and trusts formed and forming in this country is, as your committee ascertained, very large, and affects a large portion of the important manufacturing and industrial interests of the country. They do not report any list of these combinations, for the reason that new ones are constantly forming, and that old ones are constantly extending their relations so as to cover new branches of business and invade new territories.
> Your committee further report that, owing to present differences of opinion between the members of the committee, they limit their report to submitting to the careful consideration of subsequent Congresses the facts shown by the testimony taken before the committee.

Sir, in the very next Congress, the Fifty-first, the Republicans passed the Sherman antitrust law. Under recent decisions that law has been vitalized, and I feel confident that energetic steps will be taken by the Department of Justice to make the provisions of the Sherman law absolutely effective.

But Congress itself still has much work to do in dealing with the trusts. In England, thorough publicity has been found a fairly good remedy. The probability is that it has worked more successfully there than it might work here, because those who form the combinations there are generally actuated by a desire to control the business itself, with a view to increase dividends on the investments. Here, however, the combinations have generally been made with a view to stock speculation in Wall Street. But there must be a remedy for every wrong, and the political party that will solve the problem of how to control and regulate, or, if need be, dissolve the trusts, will be doing more for the common people of this country than all the theorists who would tinker with the tariff by trying to engraft their particular theories thereon. And so I say to the Democratic majority, Quit your tariff tinkering; adjourn and go home. Study the question of how to handle the trusts and combinations which tend to stifle competition and thus increase the cost of living; come back next December with a proper bill to cure these evils, and you will be doing yourselves and the country an actual service.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEKE].

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas in the chair). The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GOEKE] is recognized.

Mr. GOEKE. Mr. Chairman, I am grateful to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] for affording me an opportunity to address the House on the pending measure. I recognize that the discussion of the wool schedule, known as Schedule K, or any other one tariff schedule, necessarily involves, in a measure, a discussion of the tariff question generally, and with it its always present companion, the trust question.

I have listened with considerable interest to the speech of the minority leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and I take it that he speaks with authority for the majority of the minority. His speech in opposition to the pending bill was eloquent, learned, and gave evidence of a great deal of industry in its preparation, and we on this side of the Chamber have the highest regard and most kindly feeling for him; yet I feel warranted in saying that his speech is founded on the high-protective tariff theory—a theory that is no longer in favor with the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from Illinois is unfortunate in leading on the floor of this House a divided party. Ever since I came to this House I have tried to determine what the exact distinction was between a "stand-pat" Republican and an insurgent Republican; and as I listen to the discussion of the pending measure by gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber I am driven to the conclusion that there are but two distinctions worthy of mention between these two classes of Republicans. It seems to me that the insurgent Republican is in favor of a high protective tariff and the "stand-pat" Republican is in favor of a higher protective tariff [applause and laughter]; that the insurgent Republican upon all occasions seeks to invoke the "holier-than-thou" doctrine and disclaims all responsibility for the errors and mistakes of his party, while the "stand-pat" Republican maintains that the Republican Party can not err and is always right. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

I do not deem it necessary to devote any time in replying to the objections urged against the pending bill, to the effect that it does not afford sufficient protection to the woolen industry. That question has twice been determined by the American people in recent elections, and it is now taken as universally established that the American people are no longer in favor of high protection. I am also convinced that unless a Member is either an expert on wool tariffs, or has had the good fortune of being a member of the Ways and Means Committee, who formulated and had to do with the pending measure, one is scarcely competent to enter into an intelligent discussion of the complex figures and rates fixed by the Payne law as to Schedule K. Hence I shall content myself by discussing in a general way the conclusions reached by the authors of the pending bill.

It is a fundamental doctrine of the Democratic Party that in the writing of tariff laws taxes on imports should only be levied for needed public revenue, and that by thus levying taxes on imports it affords the only advantage to the American manufacturers which the Government can justly give, or that the country ought to be burdened with. No one can successfully maintain that the Payne tariff law was written in accordance with this doctrine; on the contrary, it is admitted upon all hands that that law contains throughout the old Republican doctrine of a high protective tariff. The Democratic Party has been placed in power in this branch of the Congress with distinct and explicit instructions to revise the tariff downward along Democratic lines, without special favor to anyone and with as much equality as the present conditions will warrant. The present Payne tariff law is full of vagaries, uncertainties, catch phrases, fraud, and deception. A casual investigation thus far made of the administration of this law at the customhouses discloses that within the short period of 18 months different constructions have been placed upon the law, resulting in the collection of a duty on imports entering the customhouse in New York and admitting the same class of imports free of duty in the customhouses at Mobile, New Orleans, and Galveston.

The same investigation shows that the rates of duty fixed by the custom officers are from time to time either increased or decreased, as the interests affected thereby may desire, and that in the placing of a construction upon the law custom officers have, from time to time, taken the liberty of consulting leaders in Congress on the Republican side as to the meaning of the same. To overthrow this monstrosity is the work that the Democratic Party has entered upon. The question naturally arises, in view of the fact that the party is in control of but one branch of the legislative machinery of this Government, "How can this best be accomplished without destroying legitimate business interests, without destroying the continued prosperity of the farmer, without destroying the opportunity for employment to the laborer, and without depleting and perhaps bankrupting the Treasury of the Government?" We on this side of the Chamber feel that we have discovered a way, under existing conditions, for partial relief at least, by revising the Payne tariff law downward, schedule by schedule, and in an attempt to carry out this policy three distinct attacks have already been made upon the citadel of high protection.

The first was the adoption by this House of the measure approving the reciprocal trade agreement, made by a Republican President, with the Dominion of Canada; the second was the adoption by this House of what is known as the farmers' free-list bill; and the third is the pending measure.

Two objections are urged against the pending measure that deserve attention. They are, first, that the bill is not in conformity with the Democratic platform of 1908 in this, that it fails to place upon the free list articles entering into competition with trust-controlled products; and, secondly, that the bill does not conform to that platform because it fails to place raw wool upon the free list.

The first objection is earnestly urged by the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], and, in addressing the House on the 8th of June, he addressed himself particularly to the younger Members, saying:

> Let me say to the younger Members in this House: In this House no one can serve two masters. As a rule he can not be loyal to the caucus and loyal to his constituency. If he serves the one truly, he will serve the other falsely. There is nothing in blind obedience to caucus, my friends. It is not good legislation; it is not good representation; it is not even good politics.

I am one of the younger Members to whom this admonition was given. I have no doubt that the distinguished gentleman from Kansas was perfectly sincere in his advice to us, but I can not subscribe to his doctrine. This Government has always been a Government of political parties, and, so long as it continues to be, the party caucus is eminently proper and usually necessary. The complaint is not against the caucus itself, but exists on account of the character of the caucus. I am not astonished that the distinguished gentleman from Kansas opposes and complains of political caucuses, because, if my information is correct, his knowledge is confined to Republican caucuses, and there is just as much difference between a Republican caucus and a good, old-fashioned, genuine Democratic caucus as there is between a "standpat" Republican and the tariff-for-revenue Democrat. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] I would like to ask the distinguished gentleman from Kansas what he finds up to this hour that has been done by the Democratic caucus in this session of Congress that is objectionable to him. The Democratic caucus named the present Speaker of this House. Aside from his political faith, I am sure the distinguished gentleman can find no fault with the present Speaker, whose every deed and act up to this hour stands without criticism. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

It placed at the head of the Ways and Means Committee the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who has the undivided support of every Member on this side of the Chamber and, I know, the profound respect and highest regard of every Member on the other side of the Chamber, and is not only receiving, but richly deserves to receive, the plaudits of the American people for so successfully leading the fight for legislation in the interest of 90,000,000 people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The Democratic caucus reduced the cost of conducting this House more than $182,000 per year. Does the gentleman object to that?

The Democratic caucus approved the Canadian reciprocity agreement. Does the distinguished gentleman from Kansas find any objection to that act?

The Democratic caucus indorsed and recommended for passage the farmers' free-list bill, and last, but not least, among other things, the Democratic caucus was responsible for restoring popular government in this branch of the Congress by depriving the Speaker of the power to name the great standing committees of the House, and thereby destroying the opportunity for one-man rule, which, no doubt, must please the gentleman from Kansas. And I maintain that the caucuses thus far held by the Democrats in this House have been for the good of the people, and deserve commendation rather than criticism.

I fear that the trouble with the gentleman from Kansas is that he does not know or can not understand the inward working of a Democratic caucus, for lack of experience in that direction. Its rules are fair and liberal; no man is gagged and bound by its edict; no man is asked to serve two masters. If his promises to his constituents are not in accord with the decree of the caucus, he is not required to abide by its decision. Without the action of the party caucus a measure of the character now under consideration could never become a law and would fall as easy prey to a minority that would be opposed to a change in Schedule K.

While we are thankful to the distinguished gentleman from Kansas for his kind advice, we must reject it because it is not sound. He complains and urges against the bill that worsted goods are not placed upon the free list and urges it as a violation of the Democratic platform of 1908. He gives facts, figures, and information that clearly establish the existence of the Worsted Trust in this country. This is, indeed, wholesome information, coming from the Republican side of this Chamber. If it were not for conditions which I shall hereafter discuss, I would cheerfully support the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Kansas to place worsteds on the free list, but I want to suggest to the other side of the Chamber, and particularly to the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] that the tariff provided for in Schedule K on worsteds is not alone responsible for the existence of that criminal combination of capital. Neither is the Worsted Trust the only trust that exists to-day. The original creation of trusts and monopolies in this country was made possible by reason of the Republican policy of high protective tariff.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOEKE. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. If the tariff is responsible for the trusts, how does the gentleman account for the trusts in England, which is a free-trade country?

Mr. GOEKE. Mr. Chairman, I am not familiar with the conditions over there, but in this country the trouble is that the tariff was originally responsible for their creation, and now by reason of a lack of the enforcement of the law against them they have become a world power and the tariff does not make much difference at the present time, as far as they are now concerned.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOEKE. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. I desire to say that England is not a free-trade country, but has a tariff.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, England, if the gentleman will permit me, is in the same condition as many other countries. England has to have money with which to run the Government, but, as compared with Germany and France and the United States, with their high protective tariffs, England is decidedly a free-trade country, notwithstanding the statement of the gentleman from Indiana. If the gentleman from Indiana will read any of the authorities on trusts, he will find that they all refer to England as a free-trade country, whether they be living in England, Germany, or France.

Mr. GOEKE. The continuation of these trusts and their present successful operation is due to the failure on the part of the Attorney General and the district attorneys in this country to enforce existing laws against these illegal combinations. In the Standard Oil case the Supreme Court of the United States, in an opinion delivered on the 15th day of May of this year, said:

Recurring to the acts done by the individuals or corporations who were mainly instrumental in bringing about the expansion of the New Jersey corporation during the period prior to the formation of the trust agreements of 1879 and 1882, including those agreements, not for the purpose of weighing the substantial merit of the numerous charges of wrongdoing made during such period, but solely as an aid for discovering intent and purpose, we think no disinterested mind can survey the period in question without being irresistibly driven to the conclusion that the very genius for commercial development and organization which it would seem was manifested from the beginning soon begot an intent and purpose to exclude others which was frequently manifested by acts and dealings wholly inconsistent with the theory that they were made with the single conception of advancing the development of business power by usual methods, but which, on the contrary, necessarily involved the intent to drive others from the field and to exclude them from their right to trade and thus accomplish the mastery, which was the end in view. And, considering the period from the date of the trust agreements of 1879 and 1882, up to the time of the expansion of the New Jersey corporation, the gradual extension of the power over the commerce in oil which ensued, the decision of the supreme court of Ohio, the tardiness or reluctance in conforming to the commands of that decision, the method first adopted and that which finally culminated in the plan of the New Jersey corporation, all additionally serve to make manifest the continued existence of the intent which we have previously indicated and which, among other things, impelled the expansion of the New Jersey corporation. The exercise of the power which resulted from that organization fortifies the foregoing conclusions, since the development which came, the acquisition here and there which ensued of every efficient means by which competition could have been asserted, the slow but resistless methods which followed by which means of transportation were absorbed and brought under control, the system of marketing which was adopted, by which the country was divided into districts and the trade in each district in oil was turned over to a designated corporation within the combination and all others were excluded, all lead the mind up to a conviction of a purpose and intent which we think is so certain as practically to cause the subject not to be within the domain of reasonable contention.

The inference that no attempt to monopolize could have been intended, and that no monopolization resulted from the acts complained of, since it is established that a very small percentage of the crude oil produced was controlled by the combination, is unwarranted. As substantial power over the crude product was the inevitable result of the absolute control which existed over the refined product, the monopolization of the one carried with it the power to control the other, and if the inference which this situation suggests were developed, which we deem it unnecessary to do, they might well serve to add additional cogency to the presumption of intent to monopolize which we have found arises from the unquestioned proof on other subjects.

In the Tobacco Trust case, the Supreme Court, on May 29 of this year, said:

Considering, then, the undisputed facts which we have previously stated, it remains only to determine whether they establish that the acts, contracts, agreements, combinations, etc., which were assailed were of such an unusual and wrongful character as to bring them within the prohibitions of the law. That they were, in our opinion, so overwhelmingly, results from the undisputed facts that it seems only necessary to refer to the facts as we have stated them to demonstrate the correctness of this conclusion. Indeed, the history of the combination is so replete with the doing of acts which it was the obvious purpose of the statute to forbid, so demonstrative of the existence from the beginning of a purpose to acquire dominion and control of the tobacco trade, not by the mere exertion of the ordinary right to contract and to trade, but by methods devised in order to monopolize the trade by driving competitors out of business, which were ruthlessly carried out upon the assumption that to work upon the fears or play upon the cupidity of competitors would make success possible. We say these conclusions are inevitable, not because of the vast amount of property aggregated by the combination, not because alone of the many corporations which the proof shows were united by resort to one device or another. Again, not alone because of the dominion and control over the tobacco trade which actually exists, but because we think the conclusion of wrongful purpose and illegal combination is overwhelmingly established.

Leading as this does to the conclusion that the assailed combination in all its aspects—that is to say, whether it be looked at from the point of view of stock ownership or from the standpoint of the principal corporation and the accessory or subsidiary corporations, viewed independently, including the foreign corporations in so far as by the contracts made by them they became cooperators in the combination—comes within the prohibitions of the first and second sections of the antitrust act, it remains only finally to consider the remedy which it is our duty to apply to the situation thus found to exist.

The law under consideration in these two cases, and especially the two sections involved, reads as follows:

SECTION 1. Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal. Every person who shall make any such contract, or engage in any such combination or conspiracy, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 2. Every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize, any part of the trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

I want to inquire of the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] whether, in view of the decision convicting all conspirators involved in the violation of the Sherman antitrust law in these two cases, he is not convinced that the true remedy for relief in behalf of the people lies rather in an honest enforcement of the antitrust law, and especially the criminal feature of that law, than it does in the mere placing of trust-made articles upon the free list? I want to inquire why it is that he seeks to criticize the Democratic position when it approaches, as nearly as the condition of the Public Treasury will permit, the placing of these articles upon the free list, putting them in the competitive class, and is absolutely silent as to the failure of the Republican officials to properly enforce the laws against these criminal combinations? I assert that it is the Republican high-protective policy that created these trusts and the absolute glaring failure of the Attorney General's department and the several district attorneys throughout the country in enforcing the law that is responsible for their continued existence. I have no sympathy with the statesmen or the individuals who have been engaged in glibly criticizing and in some quarters denouncing the court for its decision in these cases.

The Democratic Party has always been a party of law and order. To maintain law and order in this country and under our form of government, it is essentially necessary to bow with respect to the final judgment of the courts. The American people know that the courts are the bulwarks of American liberty and that the safety of life, property, and the home depend upon maintaining the law and observing wholesome respect for the judgment of the courts. If the law as interpreted by the courts is wrong, the remedy lies with the Congress; if a judge acts corruptly, the law points out the mode to be pursued to dispense with his services; but the practice of openly traducing and denouncing their judgment must and can only lead to discontent in the Republic, spread the seeds of anarchy, and, if persisted in and long continued, destroy the very foundations upon which the perpetuity of our Government depends.

It is less than a year since a once-popular President of the United States traveled around over the States of this Republic viciously denouncing and criticizing a Federal judge and courts in general, and he received an answer from the people. He indulged in that practice in the State of Indiana, and the election returns contained the answer. He indulged in the same practice in the State of Ohio, and there the people, by over 100,000 majority, sent him a message that they did not want any of that doctrine. And so with many other States in which he recklessly attacked the courts. This example, of so recent a date, ought to convince any fair-minded man that the American people have not yet reached the stage where they are willing to submit the safety and security of their homes, their property, and their liberties for determination by appeal to the mob.

Final power in a Government like ours must rest somewhere. Our forefathers, in their wisdom, placed that final power in the Supreme Court of our land, which, in my judgment, is the greatest judicial tribune in the world. This respect that is due the courts is not reverence for the personnel of the court, but it is reverence for their great constitutional power, the exercise of which should and must under all circumstances be upheld by the American people. The sober second thought and the calm and careful consideration of the decisions of the Supreme Court in the Standard Oil and Tobacco Trust cases will easily vindicate the correctness of them. When their scope and effectiveness is once fully understood by the people of this country the greatness of these decisions and the wonderful legal learning they contain will readily place them among the most celebrated decisions that have ever been rendered by that court, and will prove to the utmost satisfaction of the American people that the highest court of this land has, in fact, been their friend and benefactor rather than the friend and protector of special privileges and illegal combinations.

Do not be deceived by the declaration that the trusts and monopolies are satisfied with these decisions. These two decisions spell the "death knell" of trusts and monopolies in America. Under their sweeping terms every trust and monopoly in America can be driven out of existence. The court in these cases has blazed the way to the ultimate extermination of these gigantic combines, and it has pointed the road to the graveyard for trusts and monopolies and has started the funeral march with Standard Oil heading the procession.

Where, then, lies the difficulty, and what is the remedy? The difficulty seems to be that the Attorney General and the various District Attorneys of this country are suffering from "Special Privilege Paralysis." For 16 long years the Republican Party has been in absolute control of all the departments of this Government. During all this time the Sherman antitrust law has been in full force and effect. It has been a matter of common knowledge that the great gigantic combines of this country were violating the criminal and civil provisions of this law. Nearly 30 days have passed since the highest court in this land convicted two of these trusts of violating the provisions of the law, and yet not a single man who has violated the provisions of this law has been indicted and prosecuted in the cases referred to. What is needed is a vigorous prosecution under the criminal provisions of this antitrust law, with a view of punishing the individual who is back of these corporations, instead of the corporation itself. It has long been the established practice of the Republican Party to protect the real offender against this and similar laws. Six years ago, when Theodore Roosevelt was President of the United States, he appointed Judson Harmon, now the great governor of a great State [applause on the Democratic side], and Frederick W. Judson, through the Department of Justice, to investigate the charge of rebating against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. They traced the rebating to Paul Morton, an official of the railway company and at the time of the investigation a member of President Roosevelt's Cabinet as Secretary of the Navy.

It was after this disclosure that President Roosevelt made the acrobatic ruling that the corporations only should be held responsible for the criminal offenses of its officials or agents instead of holding the individual responsible. When they were not permitted to proceed personally against officials of this railway company for rebating, as that would have involved a member of the President's Cabinet, Mr. Harmon and Mr. Judson, realizing that they had discharged their duty and could go no further, in a letter to the then Attorney General, W. H. Moody, dated June 5, 1905, retired from the case, and, among other things in their letter of resignation, said:

> What we have said is true of all great corporations of our day. They can not be imprisoned, and punishment by fine is not only inadequate, but reaches the real culprits only lightly, if at all. The evils which we have now to fight are corporate in name, but individual in fact. Guilt is always personal. So long as officials can hide behind their corporations no remedy can be effected. When the Government searches out the guilty men and makes corporate wrongdoing mean personal punishment and dishonor, the laws will be obeyed.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

And yet, with this remarkable document on file in the Attorney General's office of this Government, he has failed to move a hand or to take any steps toward inflicting punishment upon the violators of the law in the Standard Oil and Tobacco Trust cases and numerous other cases, but permits these already convicted criminals to live in pleasure and comfort in their palaces by the seaside, built and paid for with the money that these criminals have filched from the pockets of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Do the Members on the other side of this Chamber deny that if there had been a wholesome, vigorous, and determinate enforcement of the laws against the individuals who have organized and conducted these criminal combines by the Attorney General and the several district attorneys of the United States, their destruction would have been accomplished years and years ago?

Such prosecutions would have driven everyone of them to the rocks and restored honest, old-fashioned competition and made hundreds of business men out of men that are now mere clerks in these combines and prevented the outrages so long inflicted upon the people. It is already suggested and proposed by high Republican authority and great statesmen in that party that the true remedy lies in providing a law for the incorporation of these gigantic outlaws by the National Government, thereby legalizing and vitalizing their very existence and placing a premium upon years and years of open-handed piracy and robbery. The correct solution for the future conduct of the industries involved in these gigantic combines, which will preserve the industries themselves but destroy the method of conducting them, is pointed out by the Democratic platform of 1908, which is as follows:

> A private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable; we therefore favor the vigorous enforcement of the criminal law against guilty trust magnates and officials and demand the enactment of such additional legislation as may be necessary to make it impossible for a private monopoly to exist in the United States. Among the additional remedies we specify three: First, a law preventing duplication of directors among competing corporations; second, a license system which will, without abridging the right of each State to create corporations or its right to regulate as it will foreign corporations doing business within its limits, make it necessary for a manufacturing or trading corporation engaged in interstate commerce to take out a Federal license before it shall be permitted to control as much as 25 per cent of the product in which it deals, the license to protect the public from watered stock and to prohibit the control by such corporation of more than 50 per cent of the total amount of any product consumed in the United States; and, third, a law compelling such licensed corporations to sell to all purchasers in all parts of the country on the same terms, after making due allowances for cost of transportation.

If legislation in line with this doctrine is enacted the industries themselves will be preserved, honest and legitimate business industries will be protected, labor will find continuous employment, and trusts and monopolies will be impossible. The Democratic Party never has and does not now advocate the destruction of honest business, no matter how prosperous it may be; it does not favor a policy that means ruination of business, hunger and starvation for the laborer, or the destruction of any legitimate industry; but it does insist and will ever continue to insist, until relief is afforded, that the trusts and monopolies must go. Special privilege must not be countenanced in our Government nor be permitted longer to direct the destiny of this Republic. The campaign to evade the Democratic theory of dealing with the trusts and monopolies has already begun in the ranks of the Republican Party, and the head of the United States Steel Trust is in hearty and earnest sympathy with the once popular Republican ex-President, who is the real champion of the centralization of all power in the National Government.

The second objection urged against the bill, that it does not conform to the Democratic platform on account of its failure to place raw wool upon the free list, comes rather in the form of ridicule from the other side of the Chamber than from a desire to have raw wool placed upon the free list. I maintain that the duty of 20 per cent upon raw wool, as fixed in the bill under consideration, is not a violation of any Democratic platform promise. The history of the party shows that in former tariff legislation raw wool has at times been taxed and at times been placed upon the free list. No Democratic national convention has in recent years directed that raw wool should be placed upon the free list, but, even if it were true that the party had always advocated the placing upon the free list of raw wool, yet in view of the fact that the present measure contemplates but a partial revision of the tariff, because the other branch of the Congress and the White House are in control of the Republican Party, we could not hope to pass a bill that placed raw wool upon the free list. And again, it must be admitted by all sensible men that to place raw wool upon the free list at this time would result in a deficit in the National Treasury, which would create distrust among our people and result in much greater harm than the benefit that would come from free raw wool.

The safe legislator never speculates in the Government's financial affairs. If he does it in his own affairs, he alone suffers the consequences if he makes a mistake; but when he is conducting the financial affairs of a great Government he can not afford to speculate on revenues, for if he makes a mistake the injury would not be to him alone, but to all the people alike. The Republican minority in this Congress is clearly disappointed because we have been wise enough not to place raw wool upon the free list, as they had hopes we would do. Had we done so, the cry would have gone out all over this country that the Democratic Party is advocating a measure that would certainly destroy the ability of the Government to meet its honest obligations and resort to their old cry that when the Democrats are placed in power they are unable, on account of a lack of wise statesmanship, to properly conduct the affairs of the Government. It must not be forgotten that the business world is very sensitive, that as soon as a deficit becomes apparent in the National Treasury there is a loss of confidence in the business world, the wheels of industry stop, commerce lags, trade becomes paralyzed, and a panic results in short order. If the Democratic Party in this Congress would be guilty of supporting a measure that would bring about such a state of affairs, their continuance in power would be brief, and the Republican Party, in full partnership with special privilege and the money power, would again march to certain victory in 1912. The people of this country do not expect the Democratic Party to remedy all the ills and wrongs, from which they are now suffering on account of Republican misrule, in one or two years. All they ask is that we keep the faith and act honestly in behalf of their interests. They do not want us to destroy business prosperity, neither are we going to do so. We are bent upon bringing about reform through progressive legislation, and step by step, though it may take several years, restore equal rights to the people of our land. I maintain that this bill complies in spirit, under existing conditions, with the Democratic doctrines of the past as well as the Democratic platform of 1908, and if enacted into law by the other branch of this Congress and the President it would result in untold good to the American people and clearly demonstrate that their judgment of the Payne tariff law, as expressed in the last election, was absolutely correct.

The second attack on the Republican protective-tariff system may be found in what is known as the farmers' free-list bill, recently passed by this House. This measure was vigorously opposed by the "stand-pat" Republicans in this Chamber. This measure was drawn for the purpose of giving the American farmer that which the Republican Party has for so many years withheld from him, namely, a right to buy the implements which he uses upon the farm in a competitive market rather than to be forced to buy them at prices fixed by the trusts in this country. The articles thus placed upon the free list are as follows:

Plows, tooth and disk harrows, headers, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horserakes, cultivators, threshing machines and cotton gins, farm wagons and farm carts, and all other agricultural implements of any kind and description, whether specifically mentioned herein or not, whether in whole or in parts, including repair parts.

Bagging for cotton, gunny cloth, and all similar fabrics, materials, or coverings, suitable for covering and baling cotton, composed in whole or in part of jute, jute butts, hemp, flax, seg, Russian seg, New Zealand tow, Norwegian tow, aloe, mill waste, cotton tares, or any other materials or fibers suitable for covering cotton; and burlaps and bags or sacks composed wholly or in part of jute or burlaps or other material suitable for bagging or sacking agricultural products.

Hoop or band iron, or hoop or band steel, cut to lengths, punched or not punched, or wholly or partly manufactured into hoops or ties, coated or not coated with paint or any other preparation, with or without buckles or fastenings, for baling cotton or any other commodity; and wire for baling hay, straw, and other agricultural products.

Grain, buff, split, rough and sole leather, band, bend, or belting leather, boots and shoes made wholly or in chief value of leather made from cattle hides and cattle skins of whatever weight, of cattle of the bovine species, including calfskins; and harness, saddles, and saddlery, in sets or in parts, finished or unfinished, composed wholly or in chief value of leather; and leather cut into shoe uppers or vamps or other forms suitable for conversion into manufactured articles.

Barbed fence wire, wire rods, wire strands or wire rope, wire woven or manufactured for wire fencing, and other kinds of wire suitable for fencing, including wire staples.

Beef, veal, mutton, lamb, pork, and meats of all kinds, fresh, salted, pickled, dried, smoked, dressed or undressed, prepared or preserved in any manner; bacon, hams, shoulders, lard, lard compounds and lard substitutes; and sausage and sausage meats.

Buckwheat flour, corn meal, wheat flour and semolina, rye flour, bran, middlings, and other offals of grain, oatmeal and rolled oats, and all prepared cereal foods; and biscuits, bread, wafers, and similar articles not sweetened.

Timber, hewn, sided, or squared, round timber used for spars or in building wharves, shingles, laths, fencing posts, sawed boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, rough or dressed, except boards, planks, deals, and other lumber, of lignum-vitæ, lancewood, ebony, box, granadilla, mahogany, rosewood, satinwood, and all other cabinet woods.

Sewing machines, and all parts thereof.

Salt, whether in bulk or in bags, sacks, barrels, or other packages.

The measure was adopted by this House, many Republicans, recognizing the fairness of its provisions, voting for it. If this measure becomes a law, which we hope it will, it will afford the American farmer, who has been for years and years selling the products of his farm in the markets of the world, an opportunity to buy these articles in the market of the world as well.

The first attack made by the Democratic majority in this House on the citadel of protection was the passage of the bill approving what is known as the "Canadian reciprocity agreement." This measure is clearly a reduction of tariff duties between this country and Canada and, while rather crude in its provisions, yet there is contained therein sufficient in the way of tariff reduction to show that in its creation Democratic principles were resorted to and that in two particulars, at least, it is a direct attack on two great trusts, the Lumber and Paper Trusts. For these reasons the majority in this Chamber complied with the President's request, authorizing him to conclude this trade agreement with Canada. Speaking for myself, I can not say that I am at all confident that this so-called reciprocity agreement will result in any great immediate benefit to the American people. The district that I have the honor to represent is what may be termed an agricultural district. Fortunately, the farmers of that district have for years and years known that the tariff on wheat and farm products was a fraud and a delusion, held up as an inducement to procure Republican votes on election day, and that it was, in fact, of no substantial benefit to them. The farmers in my district also know and understand that the contract relative to reciprocal trade relations with Canada can not affect the price of farm products. The "standpat" Republicans in this Chamber press their opposition to Canadian reciprocity largely because they claim that it would result in reducing the price of wheat, and that, too, in the face of the fact that the American farmer has for years and years been obliged to sell his wheat in the market of the world, which fixes the price of wheat. If we consider the statistics for the past five years on the importation and exportation of farm products to and from Canada, it will be seen that the American farmer has had the balance of trade in his favor for many years and can not, therefore, be injured by reason of the agreement.

The figures furnished on this question by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], one of the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee, have never been disputed, and I call attention to them, because a careful consideration of them must necessarily convince any fair-minded citizen that the opposition to the Canadian reciprocity treaty, based on the argument that it would injure the price of farm products, is neither sound nor sincere. These figures show that Canada buys more of the products of our farmers each year than we buy of them. The figures furnished by the distinguished Member from Missouri are as follows:

For the last 5 years, ending June 30, in spite of the tariff obstructions, in goods of kinds—
We sold to Canada	$886,417,376
Canada sold to us	393,913,673
Difference in our favor	492,503,703
Horses:
We sold in Canada	14,172,075
Canada sold to us	2,549,201
Difference in our favor	11,622,874
Cattle:
We sold in Canada	1,578,179
Canada sold to us	1,193,796
Difference in our favor	384,383
Breadstuffs:
We sold in Canada	31,596,556
Canada sold to us	6,679,844
Difference in our favor	24,916,712

The above figures clearly demonstrate that the balance of trade with Canada is greatly in our favor, in view of which it is impossible for Canadian reciprocity to injure the American farmer. President Taft, in a speech recently delivered in Chicago, clearly set out his views with respect to the effect that reciprocity with Canada would have upon the American farmer, which are worthy of reproduction. He said:

How is the farmer to be affected by Canadian reciprocity and free trade in agricultural products? Canada is so far north that her agricultural products are practically limited to wheat, rye, barley, oats, potatoes, live cattle, horses, and dairy products. She can not and does not raise more than one-sixth of 1 per cent of the corn crop of the United States. She raises no cotton; she raises but few vegetables; she raises but few hogs, because she has not the corn to feed them with; she is at present a great importer of all fruits, citrous and otherwise, from the United States; she imports a large amount of cottonseed oil, which by the Canadian reciprocity treaty is now made free; she can not fatten cattle as they are fattened in the United States, and therefore it has become very profitable for American farmers to import young cattle from Canada even with the duty on them and to fatten them for the Chicago market. The United States imports into Canada a great many more horses than she exports from the Canadians. She sends to Canada a much larger amount of potatoes than she receives from her. The United States imports into Canada about 15 times as much of meat and dairy products as Canada imports into the United States.

The only real importation of agricultural products that we may expect from Canada of any considerable amount will consist of wheat, barley, rye, and oats. The world price of these four cereals is fixed abroad, where the surplus from the producing countries is disposed of, and is little affected by the place from which the supply is derived. Canadian wheat nets, perhaps, 10 cents less a bushel to the producer than wheat grown in the Dakotas or in Minnesota, due to the fact that the cost of exporting that wheat and warehousing it and transporting it to Liverpool is considerably greater than the cost to the Dakota farmer of disposing of his wheat to the millers of Minneapolis or sending it abroad. If, now, the duty is to be taken off of wheat and the Canadian wheat can come to the millers of Minneapolis and other places, it can and will be made into flour, because the capacity of the American mills is 33 per cent greater than is needed to mill the wheat of this country. Canadian wheat can be imported and ground into flour without materially reducing the demand for or price of American wheat and the surplus will be sent abroad as flour. The price of Canadian wheat will doubtless be increased a few cents by access to the market nearer at hand, but the access to the market nearer at hand will not reduce the price of his wheat to the American farmer, for the reasons stated.

A very material benefit to all the farmers of the country, especially the stock and cattle raisers and the dairy farmers, will be the by-products of bran and shorts from the flour mills likely to follow the free export of wheat from Canada to those mills. These by-products are now so scarce and so high priced that many farmers are unable to procure them.

What is true of wheat is true of the other cereals. The trade between Canada and the United States can not but increase the sale of agricultural products across the border both ways to nearer markets than they now reach in many instances. The trade will be beneficial to both the seller and the buyer. It will not, in my judgment, reduce the price of wheat or other farming products for our people in any marked way.

Speaking for myself, I am convinced, after considering all the arguments for and against reciprocity with Canada, that it will have the effect of preventing, in a measure, at least, the further increase of the cost of living in this country; that by taking down, to an extent, at least, the useless and unnatural high-tariff wall that now exists between these two contiguous countries, inhabited by people that are much alike in their habits, customs, and mode of living, the door to greater opportunity will be opened to the people of both Canada and the United States.

Mr. Chairman, when the pending bill is passed by the Democrats in this House, which it will be in a few days, it will be another evidence of our determination to bring about an intelligent revision of the tariff downward. It will have a marked effect in reducing the cost of living by destroying the outrages of the wool tariff as fixed by the Payne law; it will further demonstrate that we are able to conduct the legislative affairs of this great Government, and merit the confidence of the American people. We are proud of the record made by the Democrats in this Congress thus far, and we have a right to be proud of that record. We have kept the faith. We have already accomplished great things; we hope to accomplish more. In addition to the attacks made upon the high protective-tariff system, which I have heretofore discussed, we have accomplished other things. We have adopted a resolution submitting to the States for ratification a constitutional amendment providing for the election of United States Senators by the popular vote. We have brought about such changes in the rules of the House as are necessary for the thorough and intelligent consideration of measures for the public good. We have enacted into law a measure providing for the publication of campaign contributions and disbursements before the election. We have passed the measure providing for the admission of both Arizona and New Mexico as States.

These are all measures that the American people want, and we responded to their will. We have already turned the searchlight upon the public service in the various departments of this Government. We are looking into the books to ascertain whether for every dollar spent by the Government it receives its equivalent in service. We are going to investigate rigidly, carefully, but fairly, and before this Congress is concluded we hope to be able to furnish the American people an exact account of what has been done with their money. We are pledged to bring about economy in the administration of the affairs of the Government; we shall spare no time or labor in bringing this about. We have already checked to a great extent the influence and power of special privilege and the corporate interests in the affairs of the Government; we are going to drive them out completely. We intend to demonstrate to the American people that the Republican Party of to-day is no longer the Republican Party of Lincoln, Garfield, and McKinley, but that it is the obedient servant of special privilege and plutocracy. We are bent on convincing the people that it will be to their interest to extend the limited grant of power they have given us so that complete control of the legislative and executive branches of the Government will be placed in our hands.

Mr. Chairman, Ohio now occupies 16 seats on this side of the Chamber. We are confident that not only will we retain them in the next Congress, but that we will increase the number [applause on the Democratic side] and, in addition thereto, contribute the electoral vote of that great Commonwealth to the election of a Democrat who is able, competent, and determined to lead the battle for genuine reform to the end that all public servants shall at all times respond to the will and wishes of the people, thereby again making this a Government of the people not only in name, but in fact as well. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, at this extra session of Congress I did not intend to inflict myself upon my colleagues by making a speech upon any particular subject that might come up for discussion.

My reason for this good intention was that I had absolute faith in the ability and statesmanship of the older Members of this House who have fought such a gallant fight under the banner of Democracy for the masses of the people for the last 13 years. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

As an humble citizen of this great Republic, I have had nothing but admiration for the leaders of this side of the House.

Under the matchless leadership of that distinguished Democrat who so ably and impartially presides over the deliberations of this House [applause on the Democratic side], I saw what looked to be a disorganized and hopeless minority converted into the greatest "fighting machine" America has ever seen; and I saw this magnificent minority, working with the power and precision of a great Corliss engine, develop into a great Democratic majority of earnest, alert, and conscientious Democrats, who move in unity as one man for the upbuilding of the fortunes of America and the freedom of its masses from the rule of Republicanism and privilege. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This master of Democratic principles, this champion of the people's cause who asked or gave no quarter when the interests of the masses of the people were at stake, this man whose heart and mind have been devoted to his people, is justly entitled to and richly deserves the highest honor within the gift of the American people, whom he has served so faithfully, so consistently and devotedly. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

For the reason that this discussion so far has been along a technical line, dealing with the technicalities of duties upon the different grades of the manufacture of wool, I have intruded upon the House not for the purpose of discussing all phases of this bill, but to devote the time so generously allotted to me by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the relation of the American laborer and farmer to the manufacturing industries of the United States.

Schedule K has been formally arraigned before the bar of public opinion and condemned for its infamy, and it needs no accuser, and upon the principles of justice no one can defend it.

Mr. Chairman, there is one noticeable thing about every speech made by the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle. They are always apparently very solicitious about the welfare of the American wage earner when it comes to a reduction on the tariff on any of the products of their pet industries.

I stand here and ask for the American wage earner one question. It is this: Why do they not show their love for him by their works? In their 13 years of absolute and unmolested control they have raised the tax rate on every man, woman, and child in the United States from $4.85 to $7.35 per capita. They loved him so well that they taxed him $2.50 per head more under Republican rule than he was taxed under Democratic rule. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

PER CAPITA TAXATION.

The population of the country in 1890 was 62,947,000; in 1900 it rose to 75,994,000, or an average annual increase of 1,294,000.

On this basis the estimated population in 1897 was 72,005,000. The Statistical Abstract estimates it at 71,592,000.

The receipts from taxation in that year were:

From customs	$176,554,127
From internal revenue	146,688,574
Total	323,242,701

On the larger basis the per capita taxation for customs and internal revenue was $4.48 and on the smaller $4.51.

On the basis of 72,005,000 population the per capita taxation on—

Customs and internal revenue was	$4.48
On customs alone	2.45
On internal revenue alone	2.05

The population in 1910 was 92,000,000. The receipts from taxable sources were:

From customs	$333,683,000
From internal revenue:
Ordinary	268,981,000
Corporation tax	20,951,000
Total	623,615,000

The per capita tax in 1910 was:

On customs and internal revenue	$6.77
On customs alone	3.62
On internal revenue alone	2.92
On corporation tax alone	.23

Comparison of per capita taxation.

	1897	1910
Customs and internal revenue	$4.48	$6.77
Customs	2.45	3.62
Internal revenue	2.05	2.92
Corporation tax		.23

Every time they open their mouths on the other side of this Chamber they say something about the farmer or the industrial toiler. The best way to prove their attitude to the masses is to show how their protected industries pay them for their toil and their products.

One of the greatest leaders the Republican Party ever had was the Hon. James G. Blaine. He said in this very Chamber what none of you gentlemen have admitted:

> That the actual labor cost of the American product is less, because the effectiveness of the American laborer is superior to that of the workingman of any other nation on earth.

Mr. Blaine was fair enough and frank enough to say what the Republicans of this House are not fair or frank enough to admit: That they want protection just for the sake of protection and the benefit accruing to the manufacturing industries.

This statement is verified by the following table, compiled by Prof. William G. Clark from official data showing the comparative productivity of American labor with that of other countries for the year 1900:

Average annual output.

American	$2,450
Canadian	1,455
Australian	900
French	640
English	556
German	460

If additional verification of the productivity of American labor as compared with other labor is required, I desire to call attention to the fact that 900,000 employees in the coal mines of Great Britain in 1910 produced 296,008,816 tons of coal, or 329 tons per man, while 700,000 employees in the United States in the same year produced 499,273,684 tons, or 713 tons per man.

If this statement by Prof. Clark even approaches authenticity, is the American laborer actually paid as much as the English laborer, who produces by reason of his inefficiency four and one-half times less for his employer than the American?

The average yearly wage of the American laborer is $437 to support three people to the family, or $8.60 per week; and in every country in Europe the laborer can purchase with $5.73 as much food and clothing as the American purchases with his $8.60 in the protected markets of this country.

Mr. Chairman, for the enlightenment of some of my distinguished friends on the other side of the House I desire to give statistics of accuracy as of the condition of the American wage earner from the Census Bureau report on manufactures of 1905:

[Census Bureau report on manufactures, 1905.]

Number of establishments	216,262
Capital	$12,686,000,000
Wage earners	5,470,321
Wages paid	$2,611,540,000
Cost of materials	$8,503,949,000
Value of product	$14,802,147,000
Average yearly wage, 1905	$477
Average yearly wage, 1900	$437
Average yearly wage, 1890	$444
Average daily wage (310 days)	$1.54
Average daily wage (365 days)	$1.30
Labor's share of product—per cent	17.6
Labor added to materials	$6,299,000,000
Labor's share of value added—per cent	41.4
Capital's share of value added—do	58.6
Living increased, 1897–1909 [1]—do	49
Wages increased in money, $33 a year, or—do	7.4
Wages increased (specified industries)—do	23
Average cost of food per workingman's family, 1897 [2]	$299.24
Average food cost:

1910 [2]	$392.00
Money increase of food cost—per annum	$92.76
Wage increase in money—per annum	$33.00
Wages increased—per cent	7.4
Food cost increased—do	31

Cost of living increased fourfold over wages.

This old "wolf cry" of their party can no longer fool the American laborer. They make a "spread-eagle" cut speech on this floor and scatter it broadcast over the land, talking about protective tariff being necessary to protect American labor against the "pauper labor" of Europe. At the very moment their magnanimous speech is falling from their lips on this floor their pet industries have got their agents scattered all over Europe, raking it with a fine-tooth comb, bringing in this "pauper labor" they howl so much about when building a tariff wall at the rate of 100,000 per month to compete with the patriotic, honest, and intelligent American toilers. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

With the exception of this outrageous schedule with which our party is now dealing, the most favored industry of Republican beneficence is the Steel Trust.

When they were giving this industry its outrageous right to tax the American farmer on his farm implements and the American people generally on the products of this gigantic trust, builded upon tariff profits unjustly filched from the pockets of the American consumer, they said that they must have it because of its infancy—it was still on the "milk diet." [Applause on the Democratic side.] But, above all, it should be protected because it employed more laborers than any other one industry in this country, and they must be protected from the "pauper labor" of Europe.

The Pittsburg Survey gave a tabulated map showing that the Carnegie mills at Homestead employ 18,711 of these "paupers," consisting of Slovaks, Poles, Bohemians, Hungarians, Roumanians, and so forth. You will probably remember that this protected industry used the military to drive American organized labor from its gates. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

[1] Dun's Review. [2] Bureau of Labor.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], with much vehemence and with the expenditure of a great amount of gesticulative energy, spoke about the "pauper labor" in the woolen industry of Europe.

I challenge their side of the House to go to New England and take an inventory of the operatives in the mills and see how many American operatives they will find.

The Boston Traveler of June 2, 1909, in its ridicule of the speech delivered by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], said:

He made an impassioned plea for the mill operatives of New England, who must not be deprived of their right to work and wages, and for the manufacturer, who must be protected against the cheap labor abroad. The mill operatives for whom the Senator's eloquence was unloosed are practically all Greeks, Syrians, Armenians, Poles, and Italians, who have driven out every other kind of labor because, under present wages in the mills, to bring up a family is impossible.

Mr. LODGE's defense for the cotton manufacturers whose mills are filled with aliens on starvation wages is paralleled in history only by the argument made in Parliament at the time England was attempting to abolish the slave trade—that if the bringing of black people from Africa to America and elsewhere was prohibitive, shipowners would not find any use for their vessels, and that these slave ships furnished the only market for decayed fish and other putrid food, on which there would be a dead loss if the slave trade was outlawed.

Mr. Chairman, if they want to protect the American laborer, why is it they did not make the Immigrant Bureau self-sustaining by placing a head tax of not less than $10 per head upon every alien entering into the United States? Would that not be better than taxing the laboring people of this country $2,000,000 per annum to meet a deficit in this department? They have been so eager to bring this "pauper labor," as they so pertly term it, into this country that they have actually failed to make it pay its own expenses, and they tax the industrial toiler to maintain a department established for taking bread and meat out of the mouths of his wife and children. I ask them again, Why have they failed to build a tariff wall around the brain, the muscle, the intelligence and the patriotism of the American-born industrial toiler, who loves his flag next to his child, who worships freedom next to his God, and who, when his country is imperiled by an attack from without, leaves his toil, leaves his wife, leaves his child, and shoulders his gun to fight the battles of his country while their tariff barons are being treated for the gout at Carlsbad or are cruising in their palatial yachts upon the silvery waters of the Mediterranean Sea? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

By their love for the American toiler they have made it possible by combinations between American industries and the steamship companies for this "pauper labor" to land on our shores at from $8 to $60 cheaper than in any country in the world.

Talk about protecting the American industries from the "pauper labor" in Europe when they are using the same sort of labor here that the foreign manufacturer is using there [applause on the Democratic side], and to prove this I submit a report from the Census Bureau showing the foreign population of the States in which these manufacturing industries were founded and fostered:

Table of foreign born, etc.

[Census 1900, Vol. I.]

	Foreign born (cxxxi).	White population foreign parentage (p. 698).	Total foreign born and of foreign-born parentage.	Total population.	Percentage of population foreign born and of foreign-born parentage.
Massachusetts	846,324	897,386	1,743,710	2,805,346	62.1
Rhode Island	134,519	140,292	274,811	428,556	64.1
Connecticut	238,210	282,245	520,455	908,420	57.3
New York	1,900,425	2,415,845	4,316,270	7,268,894	59.3
New Jersey	431,831	556,294	988,125	1,883,669	52.4
Pennsylvania	985,250	1,430,028	2,415,278	6,302,115	38.3

It will be seen by the table which I submit that Massachusetts has 1,743,710 persons foreign born or of foreign-born parentage out of 2,805,346 total population, having therefore 62.1 per cent of people who are foreign born or of foreign-born parentage; Rhode Island, in like manner, has 64.1 per cent of its population foreign born or of foreign-born parentage; Connecticut has 57.3 per cent of foreign born or of foreign-born parentage; New York has 59.3 per cent of its people foreign born or of foreign-born parentage; New Jersey has 52.4 per cent of its population foreign born or of foreign-born parentage; thus disclosing in the completest manner the extent to which this use of foreign labor has driven out the American.

This table illustrates the policy of the Republicans toward the American wage earner. They want a country overflowing with laborers, which necessarily lowers the wage scale and causes the competition to be sharp, but when you seek to apply this standard of measurement to their products they declare it means ruination to their industries.

Is there a surplus of labor in this country? The only manner by which this question can be answered is by the number of people who are out of employment and seeking it at almost any price. In the month of April in this city the Civil Service Commission held an examination for the purpose of securing 250 janitors and charwomen. Shortly after midnight of the morning the application blanks were to be given out men and women began to gather around the office. When the time arrived for the distribution of the blanks there were 5,000 men and women in a seething mass, almost fighting to get their hands upon one of these precious applications that might mean the procurement of a job at hard manual labor for $1 a day. In the Capital of protected America enforced idleness had driven 5,000 people to desperation, want, and hunger.

Now, for a few moments I desire to call your attention to the distribution of wealth of this country and to the financial condition of the masses of the people.

We have already seen by statements of fact, which may be disputed but not successfully disproved, that protection is of no value to the industrial toiler.

The labor is obtained by our industries upon a basis of free trade; the gates of America are wide open, not only beckoning the laborer of the entire world to enter, but really aiding and inducing him to enter into competition with the wage earner of our own land.

On the other hand, the American laborer has to spend his earnings for the necessaries of life in a market protected by the highest tariff rates of any country in the world.

LESS THAN 100,000 OWN CITY.

[From the New York Times.]

Lawson Purdy, president of the board of taxes and assessments, in a speech at the City Planning Municipal Art Exhibition, said that the value of the taxable property in New York City is now estimated to be about $6,800,000,000. Two-thirds, or 67 per cent, of this property, he added, is land. Mr. Purdy said that it is estimated that less than 100,000 persons own every particle of the land.

Spahr's table for the distribution of wealth in the United States, taken from his work, The Present Distribution of Wealth in the United States, when our national wealth was $60,000,000,000, is as follows:

Classes.	Families.	Per cent.	Average wealth.	Aggregate wealth.	Per cent.
Rich	125,000	1.0	$263,040	$32,880,000,000	54.8
Middle	1,362,500	10.9	14,189	19,320,000,000	32.2
Poor	4,762,500	38.1	1,639	7,800,000,000	13.0
Very poor	6,250,000	50.0	.....	.....	.....
Total	13,500,000	100.0	4,800	60,000,000,000	100.0

The inequalities have been steadily growing worse, and when a single person's fortune is estimated at a thousand millions and is gathering in $50,000,000 per annum of the net proceeds of the products of the labor of this country, while millions of human beings can not lay aside $50 apiece per annum, what must be the inevitable result? It is this condition, half understood, that is developing rapidly a sentiment of radical socialism, discontent, and social unrest.

Think of this situation, 50 per cent of our population, after all of their toil, day in and day out, have been unable to accumulate a single dollar! Never, by the practice of strict economy, being able to lay aside a dollar for the day when sickness shall overtake him. Keeping his nose to the grindstone. Never feeling that freedom accompanying the accumulation of a few dollars for the inevitable "rainy day." His poverty crushing his ambition to own a roof over his head. Looking to the future, when he shall have expended his only asset—his muscle—when he has become old and no longer able to enlist in the battle for bread, he must lay down and die in want.

Mr. Chairman, no government can keep its place in the nations of the world tolerating a system which impoverishes its industrial toilers.

You may pay him higher wages here than the laborers of other countries obtain, but by your system you pay him with one hand and take it from him with the other.

In the year 1907 I visited the great city of Pittsburg—the citadel of protection. Of all the places on this earth I there expected to find prosperity at high tide and the tide still coming in.

In this city I understood that a great banquet given by the steel barons had just been held, where $100 was expended upon each plate, where champagne stoppers flew like bullets at the second battle of Manassas [applause on the Democratic side], where all was prepared for the feast more sumptuously than did a king ever feast. All to celebrate the division of their millions, the unjust profits of your system of protection.

I expected to see a happy and contented army of industrial toilers. I expected to see them dressed in decent working clothes. I expected to see their little children going to school dressed as an American white child should be dressed.

Was this the condition in existence? No; there walking the streets, approaching the back door of the homes of those they had helped to enrich, were 25,000 able-bodied men begging bread.

There in the doorways of the most desolate and squalid tenement houses, surrounded by none of the ordinary comforts of life, with every environment tending to both moral and physical degradation, sat hungry little children, with tear-stained faces—the enforced tears of hunger—and in the background sat the mother in silence and desperation. How merciless are the trusts! [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Talk about protecting American labor. Why, Mr. Chairman, the historian of the future will define a Republican "as a person belonging to a band of organized men, who, by artful practices and deceitful means, engaged in robbing farmers and laborers of their product." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield 10 minutes additional to the gentleman from Georgia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for 10 minutes additional.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Alabama very much.

In the last Republican platform we see them not only declaring for a tariff high enough to cover the difference in the cost of production in this country and foreign countries, but for an additional duty high enough to guarantee to the manufacturer a reasonable profit in addition to the cost of freight and carriage.

This is a guaranty they extend only to the manufacturer. The literal definition of the word reasonable is: Rational, honest, just, equitable, fair, suitable, moderate, tolerable.

In the face of this solemn declaration to the American people their party convened Congress and placed the most unreasonable, extortionate, and indefensible tariff act on the statute books the world has ever known. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

For the sake of the masses of the people, may God grant that they may never give us a dose of unreasonable profit. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In arriving at this reasonable profit for the manufacturer they estimate the cost of labor, material, operating expenses, and interest on the capital invested. In seven instances out of ten, one-half of the capital stock of these industries is water, pure and simple. They therefore reward fraud and encourage dishonesty by permitting them to calculate their profits upon a par-value basis for water as well as money invested.

Their protected industries under a prohibitive tariff exact from the people not only this reasonable profit, but they add the last penny of tariff profit to the product also, thus placing in their pockets money rightfully belonging to the consumer and for which he gets not one penny in value.

The great producers of our wealth—the farmers and the laborers—had no guaranty given them that they should receive a reasonable profit on their products and their toil.

When they guaranteed to the manufacturer his reasonable profits, they gave to the farmer and the laborer a guaranty equally as certain of fulfillment that he would be robbed under the system of protection accorded the manufacturer. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let us have just a few illustrations of how they tax the farmer and the laborer to enrich their tariff barons: On every $50 worth of woolen dress goods they make him pay $25.65 in tariff taxes. On every $50 worth of flannels he purchases they place a tariff tax of $29.55. On every $50 worth of linen wearing apparel they make him pay $18.75 in tariff taxes. On every $50 worth of blankets they make him pay a tariff tax of $25.85.

The farmer has to pay a tariff tax of $16.70 on every $100 worth of harness he purchases.

On $100 worth of salt in bulk they make him pay a tariff of $44.20. On every $50 worth of machinery for the farmer they tax him $23.05. For every $50 worth of shovels and hoes for the farmer they tax him $15.55. For his china plates, cups, and saucers they make him pay a tax of $17.25 for every $50 worth purchased.

So this is what the Republican Party declared by platform was a reasonable profit.

With such outrageous profit being filched from the pockets of the masses of the people, is it any wonder that 50 per cent of our people are paupers and that billionaires are taking the place of millionaires?

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was complaining because the present bill taxed women's and children's dress goods 45 per cent, or $4.50 for every $10 purchase. Why should he complain and attempt to make capital of this rate when he and his party stand sponsor for an outrageous bill taxing the women's and children's dress goods on every $10 purchase $10.20.

Thank God we are able to save the consumer in this small purchase $5.70 if your Republican Senate will pass this bill and your Republican President will sign it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] saw fit to criticize this side of the House for its failure to tax raw rubber, raw silk, diamonds, and so forth. He says that they now come into this country free. The Republican Party made the Payne-Aldrich bill. We had nothing to do with it, and from the looks of that side of the House and the decreased number of Republicans over there, they wish to the good Lord that they had not had anything to do with it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Speaking for myself, I am in favor of placing raw wool on the free list and reducing still further the duties on the manufactures of wool, but I assume that my Government is honest enough to pay her debts, although they are debts of the most outrageous extravagance. They were not contracted by our party, but they must be paid.

In fixing the duties in the bill under discussion the Committee on Ways and Means had to take into consideration the discharge of the obligations of the Government already contracted. This bill, so far as I am personally concerned, does not express my views or the views of the constituency I have the honor of representing, but it was the best we could do in the face of Republican extravagance in the administration of the public business [applause on the Democratic side]; and we will a little later on in the season, when the tidal wave of general prosperity follows the storm of Democratic success in 1912, attend to their most pampered industrial pets, the Woolen Trust and the Rubber Trust. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

After the farmers, the industrial toilers, and the masses of the people, who have so long endured your burden, get through with your crowd in the next election, a Republican in this House will look as lonesome as a martin on a fodder pole. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, we will find in the next campaign the farmers and the industrial toilers and the masses in a different frame of mind from that in which we have ever met them. They have been reading and thinking for years. They are now ready to express themselves by voting an untrammeled ballot. They are no longer pleading with their Representatives to reflect their will in the legislation for the country; they demand that you do so. While the farmer and the masses of the people are willing to pay a just tax to raise revenue with which to run the Government economically administered, they are sick and tired of contributing their hard-earned money to enrich the few who are protected under Republican rule, and who do not contribute their just share to the burden.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield me about three minutes?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I have the honor of representing the capital district of the Empire State of the South. One of the most progressive cities in the United States is situated in this district—the city of Atlanta. My constituents have millions of dollars invested in manufacturing enterprises; we have a great army of ambitious, honest, industrious, law-abiding and God-fearing, American-born, American-raised, industrial wage earners. They are surrounded by southern environments conducive to patriotic impulses. They love their country, they love their flag, and obey the law of the land. In the seven rural counties of my district you will find upon the farms as intelligent, as industrious, and as refined farmers as will be found in any portion of this great Nation.

Since the convening of this session of Congress I have not received a single line from one of my 200,000 constituents asking me to vote for protection on anything.

My people, God bless them, are patriotic enough, honest enough, and just enough not to ask me to commit a wrong against one citizen for the benefit of another.

Mr. Chairman, my people, my glorious Southland, asks not for protection. With her great cotton crop she adds $1,000,000,000 annually to the wealth of the country. She brings back from across the seas $600,000,000 every year in glittering gold, giving to this country the balance of trade in her favor.

She is growing greater and greater each year in spite of the Republican protective-tariff laws. She grows without any aid from the General Government. She is prosperous, although she contributes her millions annually to the North and the Northwest for the payment of Federal pensions.

My people are not here, Mr. Chairman, asking for special privileges and favors at the hand of this Government.

All my people ask is that they be given justice, that they be not discriminated against, and that the markets of the world be thrown wide open that they may advantageously market their unlimited resources. Then, Mr. Chairman, will this country, which God has blessed so bountifully, "blossom like a rose." [Loud applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in explaining the Democratic caucus reason for reducing the duties upon wool and woolen manufactures the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] made special reference to a "depleted and depleting Treasury" and charged it to the operations of the Payne tariff law. From the prompt disclaimer of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and the addresses of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] it would appear that instead of a deficit, as predicted by the gentleman from Alabama, the Payne tariff law already guarantees to the Treasury for the current fiscal year a very substantial surplus. It is not wholly inappropriate, however, to concede to the gentleman from Alabama the correctness of one part of his statement, which is that, with regard to certain commodities, imports have been falling off, and to this extent the revenue of the country has been affected. This refers particularly to importations of raw wool, which decreased 50 per cent during March, 1911, as compared with March, 1910; so that for whatever this implies the agitation of the tariff and the fear of Democratic revision is responsible. Not for many years has there been such stagnation in the woolen business as there is at the present time, and throughout the trade there is a feeling of uncertainty and apprehension such as has not been known since the deplorable period of the Wilson-Gorman tariff bill. If the Democratic Party can derive any satisfaction out of this condition of affairs, or by reason of a loss of revenue resulting therefrom, they are welcome to it.

REPUBLICAN POLICY IS TO BUILD UP.

The policy of the Republican Party, as I understand it, has always been to build up and encourage industries and to keep the wheels turning so that both capital and labor may be profitably employed. It certainly can not be charged that the Republican Party has ever stood for the development of foreign industries and the production of manufactures abroad in order that deficiencies in revenues might be covered at the custom-houses of the United States, which, in the present instance, is exactly what the Democratic Party, through the spokesman of its caucus, proposes to do.

It is not my purpose to attempt to untagle the intricacies of the wool problem. It has been treated scientifically in numerous tariff bills since the foundation of the country, and it has been written to death by theorists and scholars, who have been the bane and the butt of the practical business men and wage earners who have been actually employed in production, in manufacture, and in distribution. The usual process of reasoning as between the producer and the consumer, as if in the last analysis they were not substantially one and the same person, has been indulged in until the public mind has become tired and confused.

COMPLAINANTS MAKE CONFUSION.

I know of no better way to illustrate this than to cite the witnesses who appeared before the Ways and Means Committee prior to the enactment of the Payne tariff, and who stood for almost every proposition that anybody wanted. Witness the almost humorous dialogue between members of the committee and Mr. Edward Moir, of Marcellus, N. Y., who, speaking for the Association of Carded Wool Manufacturers in opposition to the Dingley law and differing from Mr. Frederick Swindells, of Rockville, Conn., one of his own committee, as to whether ad valorem or specific duties would be best for all interests, elucidated as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Moir, take the present duty of 11 cents on the first class and 12 cents on the second; what would be the equivalent ad valorem to that, in your judgment?

Mr. MOIR. No man can tell unless you give him the shrink of the wool.

The CHAIRMAN. On the kind of wool that is imported under that provision to-day?

Mr. MOIR. It is impossible to answer that intelligently, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. So you do not know whether 50 per cent would raise the duty or lower it on the wool?

Mr. HILL. We have got it right here in our imports.

Mr. CLARK. How much is this wool worth without any tariff?

Mr. MOIR. Which wool do you mean?

Mr. CLARK. The kind you use.

Mr. MOIR. We use so many kinds.

Mr. CLARK. Take one kind. What kind of goods do you make?

Mr. MOIR. We make from a reasonably fine piece of goods down to low-grade goods.

Mr. CLARK. It seems to me that you ought to be able to give an answer to the chairman's question, and to tell him how much this 11 cents and 12 cents a pound would make, ad valorem, on wool. It is a matter of arithmetical calculation if you know how much the wool costs.

Mr. MOIR. If you would just give me the kind of wool, I would have to know the shrinkage, and then I could tell you.

Mr. CLARK. If you can not tell, that is the end of that part of it.

Mr. MOIR. I say, it is one of those puzzling questions that no man can answer intelligently unless he knows the kind of wool and the shrink.

Mr. CLARK. It seems to me that the situation is just about this: Whenever we get to a place where we want any information, we can not get it.

* * * * * * *

Mr. CLARK. What compensatory duty do you say you ought to have?

Mr. MOIR. A duty equivalent to the average, ascertained by experts, on a 40 cent per pound piece of goods, shown to be there.

Mr. CLARK. Well, I do not understand that. [Laughter.] I want to ask you one question and then I will let you alone, so far as I am concerned. You say it is feasible to have an ad valorem duty?

Mr. MOIR. Entirely so.

Mr. CLARK. Would you base it on the foreign invoice value or on the value in New York or Boston or wherever it comes in?

Mr. MOIR. I would base it on the foreign value.

CONFUSION WORSE CONFOUNDED.

A little further on the witness elaborated more fully, as follows:

Mr. BOUTELL. If you can tell—of course, if you can not tell us, just say so—if you can tell, will you tell the quality of cloth which constitutes, on the average, year by year, the bulk of your output?

Mr. MOIR. We call it a medium.

Mr. BOUTELL. What would that sell for?

Mr. MOIR. That would be made out of what we call a medium wool.

Mr. BOUTELL. I will take another start: What kind of wool goes into the bulk of the goods that you make?

Mr. MOIR. We use half-blood and three-eighths. It is grown in New York, Virginia, Kentucky, and pretty much all over the United States; wherever we can buy it the cheapest.

Mr. LONGWORTH. How much do you pay for it now?

Mr. MOIR. Which kind?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The kind that you make your goods of.

Mr. MOIR. Well, you understand that it varies very much in shrinkage; consequently it varies very much in price. We are using some wool—I have got a sample here now——

Mr. LONGWORTH. You say you go out and buy it where you can get it the cheapest. What do you pay for it? That is a simple question.

Mr. MOIR. The last wool we bought, fleece wool, we paid 25 cents for, unwashed.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Now go ahead.

Mr. BOUTELL. Well, you are helping out.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Twenty-five cents is the basis.

Mr. BOUTELL. I wanted to get, Mr. Moir, an actual illustration of the kind of wool that is in a certain kind of cloth, and I thought I was asking some very simple questions. Either I am unable to make you understand, however, or you are unable or unwilling to answer my questions.

Mr. MOIR. I am not unwilling.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BOUTELL. In other words, then, you made that out of a mixture of wool?

Mr. MOIR. Yes; about four different kinds.

Mr. BOUTELL. Four different kinds of wool were used in making that cloth?

Mr. MOIR. Yes; maybe five.

Mr. BOUTELL. Do you make any kind of cloth out of one kind of wool?

Mr. MOIR. Sometimes.

Mr. BOUTELL. How often?

Mr. MOIR. Not very often.

HOW WOOLS ARE "BLENDED."

Mr. BOUTELL. You could not say that you had recently made a piece of cloth out of one kind of wool?

Mr. MOIR. I do not believe I could. I will explain that by saying this: We are buying in lots of wool from 5,000 pounds up to 100,000 pounds. We buy them in all markets, and they have got to be brought together and put up in a pile and blended up. It is not so difficult when you know about it.

Mr. BOUTELL. You say you think there may have been five kinds of wool in that cloth?

Mr. MOIR. Yes.

Mr. BOUTELL. Could you give me the prices of the five kinds? You said from 35 to 64 cents. That accounts for two. Give me the prices of the other three.

Mr. MOIR. Oh, well, I could not give you just the exact prices unless I were home. Then I could give them to you.

Mr. BOUTELL. In other words, then, we can not get from you an actual illustration of what you paid for the raw wool that went into any particular kind of cloth that you can identify, so that we can ask the simple question what ad valorem duty you think would be fair on that cloth so identified, provided we put a 50 per cent duty on that wool so identified? You are unable to give any actual figures that would illustrate that simple problem.

Then there were questions by members of the committee and answers too lengthy to submit in the RECORD, indicating that there was great difficulty on the part of the committee in ascertaining just exactly what Mr. Moir's views were, although he represented certain carded-wool interests that were, perhaps, the chief opponents of Schedule K, which has been the subject of so much discussion on this floor. That part of Mr. Moir's statement which pertained to the ad valorem duties he advocated I deem worthy of reproduction. It shows how "easy" it was for the Ways and Means Committee to get at the facts:

INFORMATION ON AD VALOREMS.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Moir, the equivalent ad valorem of the present rate of duty on wool averages about 45 per cent?

Mr. MOIR. So the statistics show—that is about what they pay.

The CHAIRMAN. The statistics show that; about 45 per cent?

Mr. MOIR. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be a trifle over that, or it may be a trifle under that on one class or the other?

Mr. MOIR. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Suppose you had an ad valorem duty of 45 per cent on wool, what is the lowest rate of duty that you would have to have on your goods, the goods that you make, to protect your industry?

Mr. MOIR. Do you mean to figure a compensatory duty?

The CHAIRMAN. I mean the whole duty. What percentage would you have to have on your cloth, compensatory and otherwise, to protect your labor, and so forth?

Mr. MOIR. On a 50 per cent basis?

The CHAIRMAN. I said 45, but you may take it at 50 or any other figure you please and tell me what it is, and tell me the result.

Mr. MOIR. How long will you give me to figure it?

The CHAIRMAN. Have you not ever figured that out?

Mr. MOIR. Not on the basis of 45 per cent. I have figured it on 50.

The CHAIRMAN. Tell us on the basis of 50, then. You need not figure it at all in that case.

Mr. MOIR (after examining papers). On the basis of 40 cents a pound it would figure somewhere in the neighborhood of about 87 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. Forty cents a pound, or 40 per cent duty?

Mr. MOIR. Yes; not 40 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. I am talking about an ad valorem duty on the wool now.

Mr. MOIR. Of 45 per cent?

The CHAIRMAN. Of 50 per cent. You said you could tell me. You get off onto pounds.

Mr. MOIR. Yes; figured on 40 cents a pound, about 80 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. Forty cents a pound?

Mr. MOIR. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. I said on the basis of 50 per cent ad valorem on wool; or you did, and I accepted your figures. With a straight ad valorem of 50 per cent on wool, what percentage of ad valorem duty would you have to have on your cloths in order to protect you and pay a compensatory duty on the wool?

Mr. MOIR. Somewhere about 80 to 90 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you ever figured that?

Mr. MOIR. Well, roughly.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you satisfied that 75 per cent would do it?

Mr. MOIR. I am not quite satisfied.

The CHAIRMAN. Are you satisfied that 80 per cent would do it?

Mr. MOIR. I think somewhere in that neighborhood. Understand, Mr. Chairman, it is not that I do not want to give information, but you understand that we never have gone in and figured up these things. We are entirely at sea as to what compensatory duty or what ad valorem duty——

The CHAIRMAN. Yet you come here recommending an ad valorem duty on the wool, and you have not figured up at all to see what the ad valorem would have to be on the cloth?

Mr. MOIR. Somewhere about 80 per cent, on a 40-cent basis.

The CHAIRMAN. On the yarn what would the ad valorem have to be, with 50 per cent on the wool?

Mr. MOIR. It would be less than on the cloth.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I should say so. How much less? What would it be?

Mr. MOIR. The making of the yarn is about one-half of the cost—pretty nearly—in some cases one-half of the cost of the making of the goods.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it would be 65 per cent?

Mr. MOIR. Somewhere about 60 or 65.

The CHAIRMAN. Sixty or sixty-five; is that right?

Mr. MOIR. Somewhere about that, I should think, speaking offhand, because I have not figured it out.

EVIDENTLY NOT SATISFIED.

Even at the expense of tiring the House, I have made this lengthy extract from Mr. Moir's testimony, because he was, in 1908, and is still, so far as an increasing tendency to circularize this Congress is concerned, perhaps the leading opponent of Schedule K. And yet the introduction of these pages of Mr. Moir's remarkably lucid statement may be considered timely in view of Mr. Moir's opinion of the Underwood wool schedule, as reported by the Daily Trade Record of New York, in its issue of June 7. Mr. Moir, who wanted to destroy Schedule K, does not seem to be enamored of the Underwood bill, as this extract shows.

"NOT ENOUGH PROTECTION IN UNDERWOOD BILL," SAYS EDWARD MOIR.

In reply to the question, From the wool, woolen, and worsted mill viewpoint, would the Underwood tariff bill give enough protection to retain American domestic markets? Edward Moir, president of the Crown Mills, Marcellus, N. Y., and president of the Carded Woolen Manufacturers' Association, said: "I would simply say no."

It would thus appear that if Mr. Moir has been furnishing material for recent assaults upon the worsted industry, he is not entirely satisfied with the foundling the gentleman from Alabama has laid upon his doorstep.

A STATEMENT FROM THE OTHER SIDE.

At this point, and in view of the attack made upon the American Woolen Co. by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], and purely in the interest of fair play, I quote from an address of William M. Wood, president of the American Woolen Co., in Washington in February last:

I claim that the contentions which the Carded Woolen Association makes are absolutely groundless. I claim that its representatives have started upon wrong premises in the argument, and therefore have reached wrong conclusions. Speaking both as the largest carded woolen manufacturer in America, and I think in the world, and as a worsted manufacturer of the same comparative size, there is absolutely no discrimination whatever against the carded woolen interest in the wool and woolen schedule, as compared with the worsted manufacturing interest. If it could be said that there was any discrimination at all between the two industries, the carded woolen manufacturer is really being favored. He can import any and all wools that the worsted manufacturer can import and the worsted manufacturer can import any and all wools that the carded woolen manufacturer can import. Both would like to bring in heavy-shrinkage wools, from which they are debarred, but the woolgrowers of the West consider that unfair. I say this subject to being wrong—that this group of carded woolen men are not in the general sense users of wool to any great extent. Their raw material consists mostly of shoddy, made from rags, old and new, and from wastes and the by-products of worsted mills. Some of them use fleece wool; it would be interesting to know how much they use, and I think it would be found surprisingly small.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN WORSTEDS AND WOOLENS.

Worsted manufacturers can use only straight fleece wools from the sheep's back, and can not and do not use wastes, shoddies, or adulterants of any kind whatever. Worsted goods are made from straight, clean, pure wool, without manipulation of any kind. When I am buying wools in London or in Melbourne, on account of the specific duty I naturally seek for the light-shrinkage wools. Any carded woolen manufacturer has the same privilege. He uses his wool closer and does not have to figure the question of noils, which are the short combings from the fleece and which the worsted manufacturer can not use. For these noils or short wool he pays the full price, as though it were long fleece wool suitable for his use. He is obliged to sell it at a loss from that price of 33 to 50 per cent, more or less. The carded woolen manufacturer can use that product, but not altogether, and in the case of the American Woolen Co., we offer for sale in the open market these very noils and waste products of our mills, and so do all the other manufacturers, and very often they become a glut in the market—all to the advantage of the carded woolen manufacturer and to the loss of the worsted manufacturer. I can not for the life of me see why the few disgruntled men who form that Carded Woolen Association have any right to make complaint, and the fact that they are so small a minority, compared with the great number of carded woolen manufacturers of the country who do not agree with them, is conclusive evidence that they are in the wrong.

INJUSTICE TO ALL INTERESTS.

Having thus introduced the elements which are supposed to be fighting each other in the woolen business, I shall attempt to tell why I believe a great injustice will be done all interests by the passage of this bill. In the first place, it is in no sense a protective measure and has been so declared by the gentleman from Alabama. It is intended solely for revenue purposes, without regard to the welfare of American manufacturers and workingmen, whether they operate under the banner of the carded-wool man or of the maker of worsteds. Neither does it give consideration to the rights of the American woolgrower, for whom there must be protection if he is to continue to raise sheep in competition with Australia and other countries more favorably disposed as to climate. I do not attempt to speak for the woolgrower, because I hail from a manufacturing center, but my republicanism was of such a consistency as to make me stand with the farmer and woolgrower against Canadian reciprocity, and no tit-for-tat policy has permitted me to waver on any subsequent proposition leading to piecemeal and ineffective free trade. And right here I want to say—and I do not have the authority of any manufacturer for the statement—that the duty of 11 cents a pound on unwashed wool, leading up to 33 cents a pound on scoured wool, is solely in the interest of the American farmer and woolgrower to protect him against the increased expense to which he is subjected by foreign competition and the rigors of winter.

Mr. DONOHOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I shall be very glad to yield.

Mr. DONOHOE. How will cheap wool injure the textile industry of Philadelphia, which district you and I in part represent?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am going to cover that a little later on in my address, and, if the gentleman will be content, I think I can reach it in the regular way, and so save the time of the House.

Mr. DONOHOE. I will be pleased if the gentleman will do so.

WOULD PLAY FAIR WITH KANSAS.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It also encourages domestic manufacture and the employment of labor in the United States. [Applause.] It was suggested on this floor by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] that an attempt would be made to remove the duty upon worsted cloth, for no other purpose apparently than to "hit" the American manufacturer, notwithstanding the fact that the manufacturer is not directly benefited by the duty imposed upon raw wool. In other words, the manufacturer whom the gentleman from Kansas wants to strike does not receive a single cent's worth of protection until the farmer is first cared for on unwashed wool at 11 cents a pound and to the extent of 33 cents upon a pound of scoured wool. I am aware of the inflammatory newspaper and magazine articles that may arouse the people who send the gentleman from Kansas to this House, but I am proud as an eastern Republican to be able to say that I would vote against a reduction of the duty upon raw wool, which protects the farmer who raises sheep in Kansas, just as promptly as I would vote against the proposed amendment to make the man who purchases the wool compete with foreign prices and foreign wages. [Applause on the Republican side.]

OBJECT TO DISPLACEMENT OF AMERICAN WOOL.

With no expert knowledge upon this subject, and looking at it chiefly from the view point of the success and development of the industry in the United States, I want to state my understanding of this controversy. Let us begin with raw wool itself. It would only confuse the argument to attempt to specify the various grades of wool, or to enumerate the countries from which they come.

According to the Statistical Abstract the American production of washed and unwashed wool in 1909 was 328,110,749 pounds, of a value of more than $88,000,000. Foreign wool was imported in excess of 266,000,000 pounds. It was that foreign wool and the manufactures thereof, coming into competition with domestic wool of larger volume, so far as the American markets were concerned, that raised approximately forty millions of revenue for the Government, and that revenue the Democratic Party now proposes to retain, not by importing 260,000,000 pounds of wool at existing rates of duty, but by displacing so much of the American production as will by the admission of more foreign wool make up the difference between the protective duties of the Payne bill and the so-called revenue duties of the Underwood bill.

FARMER'S PROTECTION GUARANTEED.

Now, where do we stand? The Underwood bill proposes to hit both the manufacturer and the farmer, and the gentleman from Kansas proposes to hit the manufacturer. It is evident that the market of the American woolgrower is with the American manufacturer. It is also a fact that before the American manufacturer starts business he agrees that the farmer shall have protection to the extent of 11 cents a pound on raw wool of a certain grade and more or less in other grades. The position of the farmer is exactly that of the taxi-cab man who assumes that the passenger is prepared to spend at least 30 cents, and adjusts the register for that amount before he turns a wheel. Under the existing law the farmer is secured against competition from abroad and is guaranteed protection before a pound of his material is woven into a fabric.

The Underwood bill proposes to take away that guarantee, to remove that protection, and put the American farmer at the mercy of the foreign producer, except as he may be protected by the Democratic revenue duty of 20 per cent on the value of imported wool. I have a notion that the man on the farm will not support this proposition any more than the workman in the mills will support it when he thoroughly understands the effect of it. For bear in mind, enough wool and woolen manufactures must be brought into this country to raise $40,000,000 of revenue at the customhouse and to that extent displace American wool, or the Underwood Democratic revenue tariff must be a complete failure. It will be too costly an experiment for Republicans or near Republicans to indulge in, preceding the presidential campaign of 1912.

WHY WOOL HAS GONE DOWN.

We are told that the price of American wool has been going down since this agitation began. I am in a position to state that the activities of worsted and woolen mills, as well as of other textile industries, have fallen off markedly as the result of the apprehension that this Democratic tariff tinkering will continue. Salesmen are not bringing in their usual orders and manufacturers are taking no chances while the present uncertainty prevails. They are in no position to buy wool far ahead, and this in a measure accounts for the reduction in the price of wool. Moreover, many mills have closed down for want of orders, and many others, in order not to close down, are running short-handed or on reduced time. Only a few days ago the Southwark Mills Co., an establishment employing about 2,000 hands, was forced out of business, and its machinery and surplus stock have since been for sale. I do not know whether the Republican who finds fault with Schedule K knows what it means to 2,000 people, with families dependent upon them, to be suddenly thrown out of employment in a large city, but to us it is a very serious matter. And here is a single instance amongst many which tend to show the dire and far-reaching effects of a change in the tariff system under which we have been able to buy American wool and make American woolens.

REVENUE-GETTING V. LABOR.

Numerous inquiries addressed by me to spokesmen upon the other side with regard to the harmful influence of a revenue tariff upon American labor have failed to provoke that interest in the laboring man which, in my judgment, should be the first consideration of statesmen. The Democratic viewpoint has been one of revenue only, and the labor question apparently has had little or no consideration in the make-up of this bill. In fact, it is amazing to what extent this basic problem is ignored by the Democratic caucus and those who have made their attack upon Schedule K. Here is an extract from a letter written by Mr. John Burt, president of the Southwark Mills, to which I have already referred, attributing the failure of the company to the after effects of the panic of 1907 and the "unwarranted tariff agitation of 1910." Mr. Burt says:

Our concern employed over 2,000 people. Tariff agitation or the probability of it was one of the main causes for us to liquidate. There is no justice in the attack on Schedule K. I was in Europe last fall studying in detail the textile industry and went through a number of large plants. The main advantage they have is that all kinds of labor can be had at 60 per cent less cost than we can obtain labor for in the United States.

Mr. Burt, whose whole life has been devoted to the manufacture of fine woolen and worsted goods, referring to keen competition in the trade, adds:

There is no such thing in America as a woolen trust; but the truth would probably be revealed if you were to investigate the cost of the finished suit that goes to the consumer through the big, expensive department stores that control by advertisements the American press.

CANADIANS EXPECT CHEAPER MACHINERY.

With further reference to the Southwark Mills, it may be interesting, although harking back to the reciprocity discussion, to quote from a letter written by a Canadian woolen and worsted goods manufacturer to one of his Philadelphia correspondents. He was one of several Canadian buyers interested in the sale of the Southwark Mills machinery. This is what he said:

The matter of the Southwark Mills we took into consideration and had their catalogue before us, and at one time thought of sending a couple of men down to look at some of their machinery. We eventually concluded, however, not to do so, as we felt that we would not increase the worsted end of the business just at present. Moreover, with the likelihood of the reduction in the wool tariff in the United States, we fancy there will be many worsted and wool companies put out of business in the next year or so, during which time, if necessary, we will be able to pick up such machines as we may require.

At this time I lay before the House a list, forwarded under date of May 1, 1911, of mills, including the Southwark Mills Co., that have discontinued business in the Philadelphia district since the tariff agitation has been renewed:

Woolen and worsted mills in Philadelphia district that are reported to have discontinued business within the past few months.

WHY MILLS SHUT DOWN.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Does not the gentleman know that textile mills generally close down for a portion of each year, and this is the time of the year when it is customary for them to close down, either wholly or partly, and it has practically nothing to do with the so-called tariff agitation?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Many mills do close down, but the list of mills that I refer to have closed down because it does not pay them to go on and for the reason that there is no demand for the goods they make.

Mr. DONOHOE. Does not the gentleman know that the textile industry, especially in Philadelphia, has been very dull for the last three years?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is that the gentleman's judgment and information?

Mr. DONOHOE. It is the information of the textile manufacturers of Kensington.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the workingmen as well?

Mr. DONOHOE. Yes.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER]?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DONOHOE. What was the gentleman's answer to my question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was about to answer it by reading from my manuscript, but I will say to the gentleman he is correct as to depression in the textile industry in Philadelphia at the present time; a great many workingmen are out of employment at the present time.

TARIFF AGITATION ALWAYS DISTURBS.

Mr. DONOHOE. And there has been this depression for three years?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There may have been lack of employment for three years—there was in the hosiery business particularly—but during the last six months there has been a great deal more depression than at any time in the last three years.

Mr. DONOHOE. I have a number of letters saying that business has been bad for the last three years.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman confirms my statement. Business has been dull, mills closed down, and the tariff agitation has disturbed business. Tariff agitation began about three years ago.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that I have had a number of letters lately from woolen manufacturers and woolen dealers and clothing dealers stating that the trade is so paralyzed it is at a standstill, and I never have had any letters of that character heretofore.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I say to the gentleman that the information which is contained in those letters addressed to him is the information which I get at first hand from both manufacturers and workingmen in the city of Philadelphia.

Now I will answer the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

WHAT DO THE DEMOCRATS MEAN?

Mr. FOWLER. You have very nearly answered what I desired to inquire, which was, if there was any greater depression now at this season of the year than there has been in former years?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There has not been such depression in the textile industries as there is to-day since the days of the Wilson-Gorman tariff, and it could not have been much worse, I will say to the gentleman, at any period in the history of the country.

Mr. FOWLER. To what do you attribute this falling off, then, in your woolen industries?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To the agitation of the tariff question, which unsettles business and prevents manufacturers from going ahead with their business and which prevents merchants from giving them orders for goods.

Mr. FOWLER. Now, I desire to be fair. Is it not generally understood that there will be no law passed on the woolen schedule at this session of Congress?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman that we have no right to assume that no law will be passed, nor have we a right to assume that the Democratic Party was at all insincere in bringing in this bill, which has disturbed the industries of the country.

IS THE UNDERWOOD MEASURE A BLUFF?

Mr. FOWLER. Well, I desire now to be as fair as the gentleman. Is it not a fact now that it is generally understood among the manufacturing industries using wool in this country that there will be no law passed reducing the tariff on wool or on finished products of wool?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman, before I answer his question, whether his understanding of the Democratic policy, as enunciated in this House, is that this Underwood tariff bill to reduce duties is not expected by the Democratic Party to pass the Congress of the United States?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes; we do expect it to pass, if we can get the Republican Senate to vote with us and the Republican President to approve the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, I say to the gentleman, that I hope the Republican Senate will have a little more common sense and a little more humanity than to pass it, and that the Republican President will be wise enough not to permit a bill of this kind to go through.

Mr. FOWLER. Is it not a fact that the woolen industries of this country do understand that there will not be any legislation reducing the woolen schedule or the duties on the finished products of wool?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. So far as I know, there is a deep-seated fear and apprehension on the part of the woolen manufacturers throughout the country that the tariff will be disturbed, since the Democratic Party has pledged itself to reduce the tariff, and particularly Schedule K. The Democratic Party is now in control in this House and has the power to put this legislation forward if it sees fit to do so.

Mr. FOWLER. We can pass this bill through the House only.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would not for a minute attribute to the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and to the distinguished Speaker of this House, who is one of the leaders of his party, any such insincerity as the language of the gentleman from Illinois would imply. I prefer to take those distinguished gentlemen at their word. They have the power here, and they have enunciated their policy, and I understand they propose to fight it out along the line they have indicated until they get control of the other branch of Congress.

THE MEANING OF APPREHENSION.

Mr. FOWLER. The trouble is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has not answered my question. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have tried to answer the question of the gentleman. If he does not understand me, I am very sorry.

Mr. FOWLER. I can not see how the business of the country will be disturbed when there is no such situation existing as can disturb it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would it disturb the gentleman, may I ask, if, occupying, as he does, a very happy home in the State of Illinois, a messenger were to come to him announcing that somebody proposed to put a can of dynamite under his house some time within the next year?

Mr. FOWLER. If I knew he could not do it, I would sleep as sound as I ever did.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman would have the feeling that most business men now have, when there is a determined purpose on the part of the Democratic Party to put into effect its theories, and thus interfere with the normal prosperity of the business of the country. This apprehension, as I am advised, has already caused a liquidation in the wool and woolen industry to the extent of $150,000,000.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman be honest enough now to say that he expects the bill will not pass the Senate? And if it will not pass the Senate, how can there be any danger from it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can not say whether it will pass the Senate, but I can say to the gentleman, on my honor, that I will do everything I can, everything in my power, to prevent it and to stop it.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not quite understand my colleague from Illinois. My colleague is endeavoring to inform the gentleman from Pennsylvania that what he, the gentleman from Illinois, is about to do will not be very bad, because it will not be accomplished; that while he, with his party, is doing his best to ruin the country, the country knows he can not do it, and hence what he is seeking to do will not do any harm.

STILL A QUESTION OF INTENT.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That may be the gentleman's meaning, but I have no desire to so interpret it. I have wanted to give him full credit for sincerity in advocating the enactment of this bill, and give his party full credit for sincerity in introducing it. I assume that the leaders of his party were sincere and honest when they made the announcement here that they proposed to fight it out along this line if it took all summer.

Mr. FOWLER. But the gentleman still does not answer my question at all. [Laughter.] If the gentleman still says that he does not expect it to pass the Republican Senate, then I will ask him how he can expect it to disturb business in his State?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It has already disturbed business. I advise the gentleman that with such able generals as his party has on the firing line here I do not take anything for granted in regard to tariff legislation.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to thank my colleague from Illinois for absolving my conscience.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let me say to the gentleman that if his colleague from Illinois on this side has absolved the gentleman's conscience, still that can of dynamite that I referred to might disturb the gentleman in the future. I do not want to believe he puts his trust in the Senate.

Mr. MANN. I propose to have something to say to the gentleman from Illinois a little later on another matter.

HANDS UNEMPLOYED—BUSINESS MEN CAUTIOUS.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this discussion is very interesting, but my time is passing.

I am informed that at least 5,000 hands have been deprived of their employment by reason of the Philadelphia shutdowns, and that there are probably ten or fifteen thousand mill hands in the same district who are working half time because there is no demand for the product of the mills. If this condition, which is special to Philadelphia and vicinity, holds throughout the country, it can very readily be seen what the result will be if the present uncertainty with regard to tariff legislation is not relieved. It would also seem to justify the prediction of our Canadian correspondent that woolen and worsted machinery in American mills may be had at less cost under Democratic conditions than it would bring now. This is what happened during the Wilson-Gorman tariff period, and it is not to be wondered at that business men and manufacturers are cautious as to future business ventures.

FARMER AND WORKER BOTH HIT.

Now, Mr. Chairman, why does this so-called Underwood bill cause apprehension in the business world?

In the first place, it takes away the farmer's protection on wool and proposes to open up the American market, which is the best in the world, to the foreign woolgrower. Thus, in order to raise revenue the Democratic Party proposes to sacrifice the American woolgrower by displacing his product in favor of wool from Australia and other countries. It denies the farmer the protection that has been given him by the Republican Party.

And then, for the sake of raising revenue only, it denies to the American woolsorter, whether employer or employee, the protection the Republican Party has hitherto accorded him against the cheaper overhead charges and wage conditions prevailing in Europe. Regardless of the overhead charges or manufacturer's profit, the wages paid to woolsorters is as $12.50 to $15.50 in the United States to $3.75 in Germany, $4.60 in Italy, $6.40 in France, and $7.30 per week in England. Here are two comparative scales showing the wage standards set in the United States and foreign countries. The first is taken from the statement of Mr. W. A. Graham Clark, a special agent of the Department of Commerce and Labor, who was sent to Europe especially to obtain this kind of information. (See page 5709, Ways and Means Committee Hearings, 1908–9):

In regard to wages, from information gathered in Italy, France, England, and the United States, I have figured up the comparison as follows:

	Italy.	France.	England.	United States.
Sorters	$4.60	$6.40	$7.30	$12.50
Washers or dyers	3.00	4.25	5.00	7.00
Carders	2.30	4.00	3.90	6.00
Gill boxes	2.30	3.70	3.00	6.00
Comb minders	2.30	3.70	3.00	6.00
Boss spinner	7.00	9.25	12.00	18.00
Mule spinner	5.80	6.20	7.30	9.50
Ring spinner	2.30	4.00	3.00	6.00
Weavers	3.00	4.60	4.00	9.00
Fullers and pressers	3.50	4.25	6.00	7.00

ANOTHER WAGE COMPARISON.

The next comparative scale I desire to introduce at this time is supplied by the letter of Thomas H. Ball, of Philadelphia, to Chairman Payne (pp. 5766-5767, same tariff hearings), as follows:

DEAR SIR: As argument against any lower revision of Schedule K of the Dingley tariff bill as regards worsted yarns, the writer represents 30,000 to 40,000 worsted spindles here and has recently investigated and received from England the wages paid for the same work there for comparison.

Comb minders receive in England $4.30 to $4.75 per week, as against $6.50 to $8.50 in our mills here; drawers receive $2.80 to $3 in England, as against $6.50 to $7 here. Boys, $2.12 to $2.24 in England, as against $4 to $5 here. Girls in spinning rooms receive $2.24 to $2.75 in England, as against $5 to $7 here.

In regard to the French system of spinning, the writer represents Jules Desurmont & Sons, Tourcing, France, who have recently established a branch at Woonsocket, R. I., and the figures below are the wages paid by this concern in Woonsocket and in their mill in France.

Wages paid here for spinners $16 per week; in France $6.50 per week. Piecers paid here $12 per week, in France $4.50. Drawing hands $6.50 here, in France $3.25. Twisting, spooling, and reeling $6.50 here, and $3.25 in France.

Being interested in some mills in Belgium, am in a position to state with full knowledge that the wages in Belgium on this line of work is on an average of 5 per cent cheaper than in France, and in Germany on this same line of work the wages rule from 10 to 20 per cent lower than in France.

As an illustration of the difference in prices in yarns between here to-day and France to-day on the French system: 2/28, ⅝ grade, is selling here for $0.88½; the same grade in our mills in France, $0.48; 2/40, ½ blood, selling here at $1.07½, and to-day in France for $0.57; 2/50 at $1.20 here, and $0.65 in France. For weaving in England, weavers receive $3.75 to $4.24 per week, against $10 to $13 here. Warp dressers receive $6.50 to $7 in England, as against $15 here.

Yours, truly,

THOS. H. BALL.

I commend these comparisons to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD], who spoke a little while ago and who seemed to think that conditions abroad were equally desirable as those in the United States.

When we call the attention of our friends on the other side to these incongruous figures, we are told that the question is not germane to the revenue problem, or, as in the response of my learned friend from Georgia [Mr. BRANTLEY], that we are "setting up a man of straw."

REPUBLICAN PROTECTION IS THOROUGH.

Then, again, for the sake of "revenue only," the Underwood bill proposes to put into competition with American operatives in the scouring departmemnt of the various mills those who do similar work at one-half the wage in England and one-third the American wage in Germany, France, Belgium, and other countries. The Republican Party has hitherto provided against this difference in the wage account, so that in no one particular branch of the business has the foreigner got an undue advantage over his competitor in the United States. To me it is a matter of small consequence whether the carded-wool manufacturer in the United States feels that he can not keep up with the improved machinery and facilities of the worsted manufacturer, so long as we are able to give each of them a fair chance in their respective lines and along the various stages of production against unfair competition in other countries. If wool can be sorted in England and Germany cheaper than it can be sorted in the United States, we should put up a barrier covering the difference in cost of wool sorting at home and abroad. That is exactly what we did for the farmer when we took care of him to the extent of 11 cents a pound on raw wool, aggregating 33 cents a pound on scoured wool. We have made the foreign wool producer meet the barrier at the customhouse and have compelled him to enter this country on equal terms with the American producer.

BARRIERS ERECTED, STEP BY STEP.

And if we did put up the barrier for the benefit of the wool-grower and then of the wool sorter, what are we to say of the wool scourer, who can do the work of scouring so much less in foreign countries than we can do it here? Why, of course, to be consistent and fair to this separate industry, we must rear the barrier against him, else the whole scheme of protection fails. And if the scouring is done cheaper abroad and protection is needed at the customhouse, then carding, which is a separate trade, must also have protection; and combing, which starts the worsted manufacturer at the parting of the ways from the woolen manufacturer, must also in all fairness have his protection. Spinning can be done cheaper abroad than it can be done here, and so we require a special rate of duty for foreign-made yarns. If it were otherwise, we would surely permit the extinction of vast industries in the United States and flood this market with foreign products. In actual practice the Republican Party has protected, step by step, every interest associated with the wool business from the shearing of the sheep to the finishing of the cloth. We can not withdraw any one step of protection along the whole line of associated industries in the wool and woolen business without endangering them all. [Applause.]

PRACTICE V. THEORIES.

And when I speak of Republican "practice" or "performance" I want to differentiate between the theories that we hear so much about upon the other side, theories from men who know nothing of the conditions that prevail in great industrial centers; theories of those who live in the past and amongst their books, and who get their ideas from philosophers who know not how to earn their bread and butter, nor realize the necessity of the daily wage to the man who lives in the city.

I say "practice," because the Republican Party has gone on step by step to protect the interests of the people of this country, regardless of fine-spun theories that lead on to a remote millennium. And while the Underwood bill, framed solely for the purpose of raising revenue, strikes down every one of the branches of industry involving the employment of labor in the manufacture of woolens, it is worthy of more than passing comment that the highest rate of duty provided in the bill has been placed against foreign importations of blankets and flannels, women's and children's dress goods, and ready-made clothing. Here is where we get the low-grade or adulterated material, and here is where the Underwood bill accords protection, while it professes to raise revenue. The ad valorem duties in these particulars run up to 45 per cent, so that with respect to the finished product the ready-made clothing manufacturer and the maker of ladies' and children's dress goods would seem to be favored against the workman whose livelihood depends upon the working up of the material. This new provision would mean that on a $20 suit of clothes made in London the importer would pay $9 at the customhouse, or upon $10 worth of ladies' or children's dress goods imported from France would pay $4.50 at the American port. It can not be denied that there are elements of protection for certain merchandising interests in this Democratic proposition, but it may be safely left to the importer or the manipulator to see that the price to the consumer is not reduced because of the high duty proposed.

WANTED FOREIGN VALUES ON IMPORTS.

Those who appeared before the Ways and Means Committee attacking the system that prevails under the existing law insisted that the foreign value of imports be taken. That is what the trader in tailor-made suits and in ready-made clothes wants. He wants to pay upon the price in England, France, or Germany. The value will be taken there and goods will come in at the lowest prices—$4, $5, and $6 per suit—and be taken over by the importer to the great department stores, where the consumer who seeks relief will pay the same old price in the same old way. Meanwhile American wool will be depressed and workers in the American mills will be sacrificed to the makers of ready-made clothing in England, in France, in Germany, and in Italy.

And would the consumer get his clothes any cheaper? Does the consumer get oil cheaper or sugar cheaper by reason of any operation of the tariff system? Do we get coffee or tea cheaper because we have removed the duty from coffee and have placed no duty upon tea? Do you think importers are in the business of seeking the world over for cheap goods, bringing them into the customhouses of the United States free, under Democratic policy, have no expectation of getting the American price for them? This is the problem of the farmer and the wage earner who is looking for cheaper goods from abroad.

AMERICAN PRICES DISCUSSED.

It is a matter of common knowledge that notwithstanding the increased expense of the American manufacturer he is still able to supply the market with cloth made of pure, new wool, of 16-ounce weight, which can be put upon the counter of a merchant tailor at $1 to $1.50 per yard. I have here three samples of woolen fabrics, 3½ yards of which, enough for a suit of clothes, would cost, respectively, $3.98, $4.20, and $4.29. This is the finished product that comes out of the mill. It goes into the suit of clothes you buy from the tailor or the ready-made dealer, and the cost of it when it leaves the mill, with all tariff charges included, as if it were an imported cloth, with labor and manufacturer's profit all counted in, was $3.93, $4.20, and $4.29, respectively. In no instance would an American, unless an uncompromising Anglomaniac, be ashamed to wear either piece of cloth when worked up into a suit of clothes.

At these prices every item of protection under the Payne bill was accorded to the manufacturer, and yet, with his great plant and his large number of skilled employees, he, this "robber baron," this "trust magnate," had to get his profit out of that $3.93, that $4.20, and that $4.29.

THE MILK IN THE COCONUT.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we are getting down to the milk in the coconut.

What did the consumer pay for the suit of clothes which, as cloth delivered by the manufacturer, was sold for the sums indicated? If he went to a department store, he may have paid anywhere from $10 to $25. Surely the manufacturer did not get any of that money. But as the consumer is complaining why not have him go beyond the manufacturer and the tariff and the workingman, all of whom were paid out of the manufacturer's price, and find out who got the difference between $4.29, which was the manufacturer's highest price, and the $10 to $25, which is the retailer's price? I do not assert that any of this money was wasted, or that it was not properly circulated in the community, where it did good, but in the interest of truth and justice I think it should be known that the manufacturer did not get it, and that the tariff has little or nothing to do with the price to the consumer.

I have taken the trouble during the last few days to inquire a little more fully into the tariff cost of a suit of clothes. It is difficult to get a worsted man who uses the long-staple wool to figure this out, and as a rule the carded-wool manufacturer, who uses the shorter staples and admixtures of wool, is also disinclined to tell just how it works out; hence I have put this question up to a manufacturer of yarn, who is as well posted upon all branches of the business as any man of whom I have knowledge. I told him to give me the worst side of it, and I am advised that the estimates presented are improbably high.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. The advertisement of the American Woolen Co. makes it appear that they make, and they say they make, annually 50,000,000 yards of cloth. Now, their net profit last year was something like $4,200,000. That figured out would make their profit at the mill on a yard of worsted cloth about 7 cents. Does that follow the gentleman's figures?

THE FIXING OF PRICES.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am going to give the figures that will answer the gentleman's question. I want to say, before I quit the gentleman from Kansas, that the annual consumption of wool and woolens in the United States is valued at about $400,000,000; that is, the annual output of manufactured wool in the United States. We make in the United States three hundred and eighty millions worth of that consumption. The American manufacturer makes 95 per cent of all the woolens consumed in the country. I am told, answering the gentleman's question further, that the American Woolen Co., while it is the largest of the carders and combers in the United States and is, perhaps, the largest single combination manufacturing both worsteds and woolens, still produces only 15 per cent of all the output in the United States, and therefore does not control prices and does not constitute a trust that interferes with competition, and certainly could not control prices upward.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania contend that in any given industry a trust must control a majority of the units in order to control prices? Does not the gentleman know that it is not necessary for a given organization to control a majority of the units in order to control prices? If the gentleman will read the ordinary textile journals he will find reference to the fact that small manufacturers in the country wait until the American Woolen Co. fix their prices, because they do not dare to make theirs before.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not prepared to agree with the gentleman, so far as my information goes, but I will read an extract from a paper by Mr. Julius Forstmann, president of the Forstmann & Huffmann Co., of Passaic, N. J., and formerly a member of the German tariff commission, which bears upon this point.

Mr. Forstmann says:

> I may say that I am very well informed about the conditions in this and the principal European markets, and I do not hesitate to assert most positively that, despite the fairy tales we hear of the Woolen Trust fixing the prices for American woolens, there is not a single country where competition between woolen and worsted manufacturers is so keen as it is in the United States.

I have already observed to the gentleman that my information is that the American Woolen Co. does not produce more than 15 per cent of the entire cutput of the worsteds and woolens of the United States. I will now yield to the gentleman from New York.

CONCERNING THE AMERICAN WOOLEN CO.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Kansas stated the capitalization and the profits of this concern——

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I said that the American Woolen Co. announced that they made 50,000,000 yards of cloth annually. Now, their net profits last year were $4,200,000. These two figures ought to give the net profit of a yard of cloth at the mill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What was the capitalization?

Mr. MURDOCK. Sixty million dollars.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And the average weekly wage was about $7.30?

Mr. MURDOCK. So we have heard here to-day.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wanted to see how the profits were distributed by this eleemosynary concern.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think some one, probably some Member from New England, may answer the gentleman on that point. I am not speaking for the American Woolen Co., although my information is that the American Woolen Co. does not produce or put on the market more than 15 per cent of the entire woolen and worsted production of the United States, and therefore is not such a trust as is indicated by the gentleman from Kansas or the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does not the gentleman think that the American Woolen Co. manufacturing 50,000,000 yards of cloth a year, and at a net profit of $4,200,000, that those figures make it possible to figure out what the net profit per yard is at the mill?

NO EXCUSES FOR FALSE CAPITALIZATION.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not posted on the financial affairs of the corporation. I am stating the facts as they come to me in relation to the American Woolen Co. and its influence in the business. The inference of the gentleman from New York with regard to wages paid by this particular concern may be answered by some one from New England, who knows more about the business than I do. As to the question of capitalization and profits raised by the gentleman from Kansas, I would say, on reflection, that an annual profit of $4,000,000 on an investment of $60,000,000 would not be excessive. It would be no more than the interest paid in some parts of the country upon mortgages which are certainly better security than bonds or stocks of an industrial corporation subject to all kinds of regulations as to liability and damages and periodical tariff tinkering. If the gentleman's objection were based upon false or watered capitalization, I would offer no excuses for those who indulge in such practices.

PURE WOOL AND FOREIGN MAKES.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to embarrass the gentleman, but is he talking about all-wool worsteds or worsteds made up of cotton warp and wool filling or worsteds made of wool and cotton yarn twisted together, because it makes all the difference in the world in figuring out the tariff whether it is one of the three varieties—all wool made of cotton warp with wool filling or all cotton and wool twisted together in the yarn. Is the gentleman talking about all wool?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am talking about all-wool garments. I observe also that the gentleman refers to admixtures of cotton. Of course, admixtures of other ingredients enter into this discussion and also enter very largely into the merits of complaints made by opponents——

Mr. MURDOCK. Necessarily, of course, because compensatory duties must enter into the relation of the tariff.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And that raises the question whether or not the consumer, the man for whom the gentleman speaks and for whom I think I speak, wants an inferior, adulterated article, such as the cheap foreign grade, or a pure article, made by American workmen in American factories, of which we make most in this country.

Mr. MURDOCK. The point is, is not the American consumer to-day, under the present arrangement, paying an all-wool price and all-wool tariff and a compensatory duty of 44 cents a pound on a pound of clothing—is he not paying it, and, as a matter of fact, getting a piece of clothing that is 50 per cent only of wool?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My information is that what he pays to-day when he buys the American garment is what he in part contributes to the producer of wool in the United States and the workmen in the United States. If he buys an article that is inferior, he is buying an article that is largely a matter of production in foreign countries and, so far as the material is concerned, an adulteration, since it contemplates the use of imported shoddy, mungo, waste, and rags. But, to answer the gentleman specifically, I am dealing now with what is understood to be pure wool, and my illustrations relate to pure-wool manufactures only.

REVEALING THE "MONSTER" TARIFF.

Now, let us "take off the lid" and investigate this "hydra-headed monster," the worsted tariff, that seems to give the gentleman from Kansas so much concern. Take what are known as "common makes," such cloths as are made both by woolen and worsted manufacturers, cloths that bring $1 a yard or thereabouts, remembering always that it takes 3½ yards to make a man's suit. The foreign value of that cloth, if weighing 16 ounces, is 40 cents a yard. In order to protect the dollar-a-yard cloth in the United States and keep the factories going here, how does the Payne bill treat the corresponding 40-cent yard of foreign cloth that undertakes to compete with us? Three and one-half yards at 40 cents a yard is $1.40. First of all, it puts on the farmer's wool duty, which, at 33 cents a pound for scoured wool, is $1.16; it then adds the ad valorem duty of 50 per cent now given to the manufacturer as a compensating duty for sorting, scouring, carding, combing, spinning, weaving, and the like, which, at $1.40, is 70 cents. Add expenses of 14 cents for transportation, insurance, packing, and the like, and the total cost of that $1.40 worth of foreign cloth, becomes, by virtue of the increased wages and expenses in the United States, $3.40 for the 3½ yards. In other words, it is presumed to come up to the American price.

The total tariff, therefore, on the cloth for that suit of clothes, if imported, is $1.16 farmer's wool duty plus 70 cents manufacturer's protective duty, or $1.86. That is what the American consumer would pay on that suit of clothes if he were disinclined to keep the woolgrower, the manufacturer, and the workingman busy in this country and preferred to have his cloth brought in from abroad. But under no circumstances should sight be lost of the fact that if he insists upon the removal of that barrier of $1.86 against the incoming of the foreign-made cloth, he deprives the American woolgrower of a market for the 3½ pounds of scoured wool that would go into the suit, and he strikes a direct blow at the earning power of every American mechanic who in any way had to do with the production, the manufacture, or the distribution of the wool, and the list of those thus affected could be traced into almost every industry into which human labor is now employed in this country.

A VOICE FROM MINNESOTA.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has spoken several times about the farmers.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I mean the woolgrower, I would say to the gentleman from Minnesota. I understand the farmer is a raiser of sheep.

Mr. STEENERSON. Sure. My question is this: I heard the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and several other gentlemen familiar with the sheep industry say here that the price of wool to the farmer or the producer was about 16 cents and as low as 12 cents.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did he tell the reason why?

Mr. STEENERSON. Now, I want to know if the same class of wool when imported could be bought for 4 cents or whether the manufacturer did not give the farmer 11 cents. It seems to me there is a discrepancy between the price the farmer gets for the raw wool and the duty.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Neither the manufacturer nor the farmer gets the duty. That goes to the Government, of course, and the theory of the Government is that it not only raises revenue, but that it protects the American industry, both upon the farm and in the factory.

Mr. STEENERSON. It ought to raise the price of the wool 11 cents.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; or protect it to that extent.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does it do it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It ought to raise the price, provided there is an American market for wool, which there is not at the present time, owing to tariff legislation. It does protect to that extent against foreign wool.

Mr. STEENERSON. We produce only 60 per cent of the total wool consumption.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the proportion is about that.

CHEAP WOOL, CHEAP SHEEP.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. MONDELL stated, and I think the report on this bill says, that the United States produced only 56 per cent of the total wool consumption.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We undoubtedly use more American wool in American factories than we use of foreign wool.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think the gentleman is entirely mistaken. I think we use more American wool than imported wool.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I say we use more American than imported wool. Perhaps I did not hear the gentleman, or he did not hear me.

Mr. STEENERSON. Fifty-six per cent is the figure given.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And I say, so long as the tariff agitation lasts, and the manufacturers can not do business, and there is no demand for American wool, the price of wool naturally will go down. That is what it did during the Wilson-Gorman era. But that is no reason why conditions should be made worse than they are.

I do not know whether I ought to quote the gentleman, but Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, in a talk outside of this House a little while ago, said that he recalled readily that under the old Democratic system sheep sold for 65 cents, wool, meat, and all; and another gentleman, who comes from the West, said he recalled when they sold for 50 cents. They may sell for that again, but in my section of the country we do not want to see them sell at such prices, for that means depression.

Mr. STEENERSON. But the gentleman has not answered the question of whether the farmer gets the enhanced price on account of the duty?

MANUFACTURERS DARE NOT BUY AHEAD.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The farmer undoubtedly gets an enhanced price when there is a market for wool, but he can not get the price he has been getting unless a duty is levied upon imports of wool. The trouble now is that manufacturers dare not buy wool in advance nor proceed to manufacture extensively because of the tariff uncertainty.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman from Wyoming said here in his speech a day or two ago that the difference between the price of wool grown here and that imported of the same grade is very close to the duty. How do you explain that the producer of wool did not get that 11 cents?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can only say to the gentleman that the theory of the law is that before a pound of foreign wool can come into this country in competition with the woolgrower, for instance, in the gentleman's State of Minnesota, that 11 cents a pound shall be paid on it at the customhouse. While the farmer does not get that particular 11 cents, the farmer gets the benefit of the barrier which the Government thus raises against foreign wool, which would displace the Minnesota or American wool had the barrier not been there.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is it not a fact the manufacturer of this country does not pay the producer of wool the price that he ought to have?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I believe the American manufacturer pays the American wool producer as high a price as is paid for wool the world over, when there is a demand for the wool; and as American wool is as good as any other wool, the American manufacturer is as anxious to get American wool as he is any other kind of wool.

THE 11 CENTS PER POUND DUTY.

Mr. STEENERSON. I have never heard anybody explain specifically the reason why the producer of wool does not get the price of the same grade of imported wool with the duty added.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Do you mean to say we should turn over to the wool producer the 11 cents which we collect at the customhouse?

Mr. STEENERSON. That is what your speech states the farmer gets.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, the gentleman misunderstands me.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, may I have a little more time?

Mr. MANN. How much more time?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. About 25 minutes, unless I am interrupted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, by authority of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania 25 minutes additional.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I will not interrupt the gentleman any further if the gentleman will allow me——

DOES THE FARMER WANT FREE WOOL?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Before the gentleman from Minnesota takes his seat I want to have it understood that I have never heard anyone in this House or anyone anywhere else indicate that the farmers of the country expected that the 11 cents collected on a pound of foreign wool at the customhouse was to be paid over to the farmer.

Mr. STEENERSON. I assume that the duty ought to enhance the price of wool in this country; if it does not do so, it is no use to have it for the benefit of the farmer——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If it does not enhance the price, of course there is no use of the duty, except for revenue purposes.

Mr. STEENERSON. And we ought to have free wool.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman thinks we ought to have free wool, I think I can speak for the manufacturers sufficiently to say that if the farmer whom the gentleman represents is willing to accept free wool and meet the competition from abroad, that the manufacturers would not be hurt one cent's worth. They have been standing with the producer of wool and have given him the benefit of the American price for wool. It is not, as I understand it, a matter of great concern to the manufacturer at all. Free wool is the woolgrower's affair; but the manufacturer, in my judgment, should stand up with the rest of his fellow-citizens and producers in the United States and maintain the Republican system of protection, even if there be some who reject its advantages.

Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I can not make the matter more clear to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], and I shall proceed.

MANUFACTURERS' PROFIT 5 CENTS A YARD.

It makes no difference what the consumer pays the department store for domestic goods or what he pays the merchant tailor, the Government, and not the manufacturer, would get the $1.86 out of that suit of clothes; the farmer would get an American rate for his wool; and the net profit of the American manufacturer, according to the estimate given me, would be only 5 cents a yard on 3½ yards of cloth, or 17½ cents in all. Surely such a profit to the maker of the cloth, in view of the price at which it is laid down to the tailor or ready-made-garment maker, is not sufficient to justify the terrific assault that has been made upon the men who invest their money in industrial enterprises and take all the risk incident to the manufacturing of cloth and its various component parts.

I am taking pains to give this illustration, because I think the man who inveighs against the woolen schedule ought to know exactly what he is doing, and he at least ought to be in a position to know the truth. I have had examples on "common makes" worked out for 14-ounce cloth, on which the tariff for 3½ yards is shown to be $1.71, and on 12-ounce cloth, $1.57. In each instance the cloth manufacturer's profits, notwithstanding all his risks and expenditures and the labor cost, was not in excess of 5 cents a yard. And I am told that whereas numerous manufacturers would be willing to enter into long-term contracts to accept 5 cents a yard profit on the best woolen and worsted cloths turned out by them, yarn manufacturers would be equally well satisfied with a profit of 5 cents a pound.

AN AMERICAN-MADE SAMPLE.

There is another way of bringing the consumer to a better understanding of this situation. If he will buy a piece of cloth from the manufacturer or the dealer in cloth, he will very readily find what it costs to have a suit of clothes made, over and above all tariff and manufacturers' charges. A few months ago a distinguished citizen of Rhode Island, not knowing my interest in this question, presented me with 3½ yards of cloth which had been made at one of the mills in that State. He wanted me to have it made into a suit to be worn at the opening session of Congress. Subsequently, at my request, he gave me the following statement with regard to this American product:

This cloth at the time it was manufactured and placed on the market sold at $2.25 net per yard at the mill. What this amount represented is shown by the following table:

Profit per yard	$0.10
General expenses and selling cost, per yard	.08
Labor cost, per yard	.42
Dyeing (dyestuffs and general expenses of dyeing)	.10
Yarns used, 20 ounces, at $1.25 per pound	1.55
Total	2.25

At $2.25 per yard, a very good price for cloth—in fact, a very high American price—the total cloth cost of that 3½-yard suit was $7.87½.

Mr. MURDOCK. That was 3½ yards?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. How much profit per yard?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Ten cents; 35 cents in all.

That paid all the manufacturer's charges and all the wages, and put the tariff behind it. The manufacturer's profit on this special 3½ yards was 35 cents.

WHERE THE COST COMES IN.

Now let us see how this problem works out, and let the consumer have the truth as to the whole transaction. The "robber baron" manufacturer and the tariff are now out of it altogether. The profits of the farmer, the manufacturer, the workingman, and the Government were all covered by that $7.87½.

I sent that cloth to a tailor whom I know very well and like very much. We have had many friendly discussions about the tariff and its alleged iniquities and about the high profits to the manufacturer of cloth. "Did you get that cloth?" I said. "Yes; that is good stuff. Did you get it from the other side?" "No;" I said, "it was made in the United States—made up in Rhode Island. What will you charge for making it up?" "Well, it will cost you $30." "Why, I thought you said the tariff was responsible for the high cost of clothing? That whole bolt of cloth, tariff included, cost only $7.87½." "Well," he said, "you know labor and other expenses have a great deal to do with it." "Yes," I said; "I think I can see it now; that $30 does not go to the manufacturer, and it does not go to the tariff; it goes into the rent of your fine store. It pays your cutters and seamstresses. It pays for your electric lights, and your liveried messengers, and your delivery wagons, and it pays for your advertising, and the literature you put out—and it is not the tariff after all."

Now, I think this illustration shows where the consumer's money goes, whether he buys groceries, or farm produce, or clothing.

BETTER TO SPEND MONEY HERE.

But in order to trace out the tariff in that 3½ yards of Rhode Island cloth at $7.87½, I again consulted my yarn manufacturer friend with this result: If that cloth weighed 16 ounces and was worth $2.25 per yard in the United States, its foreign value would have been $1.12 per yard, or $3.92 for all. If that cloth had come from England instead of Rhode Island, the Payne law would have added to the $3.92 of foreign value the farmer's specific wool duty of $1.54; the manufacturer's ad valorem duty against the various steps in the process of manufacture abroad, of $2.16, and incidental expenses, 26 cents, making up the full American value. If the cloth had been lighter and weighed 14 ounces, the duty would have been $3.58, and if it had been 12 ounces, the duty would have been $3.47.

So the tariff on that $7.87½ of cloth made into a suit for $30, therefore, would have been $3.70—that is, if I had preferred to buy the cloth at the low English rate and cut out the American industries affected. But having permitted the charge of $3.70 to be raised against an importation of English cloth at the customhouse, I would at least have the satisfaction of knowing that by purchasing an American-made article I had promoted the welfare of the American woolgrower, had helped to keep the American mills employed, and had so provided for those industries that if some one else desired to bring in the English garment they would, to the extent of the tariff they would be obliged to pay, relieve our citizens of a more direct tax for the revenue needed to run the Government. Speaking for myself, as the consumer in this instance, I would rather have that duty charged up against me on the one or two suits of clothes I buy a year than to have the sheep ranchers of this country put out of business, the mill districts depopulated for the advantage of our competitors on the other side of the water, with the further certainty of a resort to some direct form of taxation to keep the Government going. [Applause.]

THE READY-MADE CLOTHING CONTROVERSY.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. When the Payne law was being considered by the Ways and Means Committee a number of woolen manufacturers made this sort of a statement, that while they admitted it was true a custom-made, high-grade suit of clothes cost substantially less in England than it did here, that a ready-made suit of clothes of a comparatively cheap cloth was no higher here than it was in England. Has the gentleman made any investigation as to that?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I referred to that in a general way in the earlier part of my remarks.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I did not hear the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand some of the conditions that prevail in the gentleman's own city, Cincinnati, with regard to a complaint made as to the quality of cloth that entered into ready-made goods. It involves the question of adulteration and was referred to the other day by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], and it has been answered time and again by experts. I am not sufficiently expert to answer it, but I will say to the gentleman that undoubtedly there are two sides to that story.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FOWLER. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague [Mr. MANN] be permitted to answer the question just propounded.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. If I should do that, would I be authorized to insert after my question "applause," whether it occurred or not? [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Under the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I feel, as this is a request for unanimous consent, that I would have to object. I need the time.

DISADVANTAGES OF THE MANUFACTURER.

With the permission of the House I intend to append to this address certain statistical statements, showing the great advantage foreign manufacturers have over American manufacturers in the matter of overhead charges, cost of machinery, and wage scale. None of these factors entering into the cost of production are taken into account by the Underwood bill. Neither does that bill give any promise of relief to the manufacturer in the matter of the charges to which he is subject, apart from labor cost. These have been so well set forth in a recent brochure by Mr. Julius Forstmann, that I quote from him the following summary:

1. Capitalization of mill.
2. Erecting and organizing mill: Building material, labor, and supplies. Equipment—machinery, etc. Organization of plant.
3. Operating and maintaining mill: Management and supervision. Wages. Raw material, general supplies. Interest. Repairs and allowance for depreciation.
4. Outlet for goods: Domestic market. Foreign market.

Nor does Mr. Forstmann mention employers' liability in accident or damage cases, nor insurance, which are serious considerations to every employing manufacturer.

BRICK HOUSES NOT IMPORTED.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. I want to ask the gentleman this question: In the erection of a mill, is there any tariff on the labor expended by those men who erect it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not know whether the gentleman is raising a philosophical question or not, but——

Mr. CULLOP. I ask whether there is any tariff on the labor of a brickmason or bricklayer when he builds the house—the finished product?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There may be a tariff on some of the materials that enter into the construction of the house.

Mr. CULLOP. No. What I wanted to know is whether there is any tariff on his finished product when he builds the house?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman refers to the workingman in the building trade? I want to get the gentleman's meaning.

Mr. CULLOP. No; I am referring to his labor. There is no tariff on the labor of brick masons.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I asked if the gentleman's question was philosophic, and I think it is. The gentleman from Indiana evidently agrees with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER] who spoke this morning and indicated that there was free trade in labor. I am inclined to think it will be very difficult to have free trade in labor when one man may have skill and another man no skill and when one man may be a constitutional lawyer and another man may be an ignoramus.

HERE IS A NEW PROBLEM.

Mr. CULLOP. Is there any tariff on the brick house when it is done—when the labor of the workman has been expended upon it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; the existing tariff law raises no barrier against the erection of a house.

Mr. MANN. It would if it were imported.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; in that case it should. We import wool and woolen manufactures, but I have not heard of anybody so progressive as to enter into the business of importing ready-made houses. [Laughter.]

But, speaking of the manufacturer, Mr. Chairman: He erects a mill, pays American building-trade wages, invests and risks his capital, and makes purchases of various commodities and materials upon which there are tariff duties. If his protection as a manufacturer is to be denied, will he be able to purchase the commodities he uses at a lower rate than heretofore? Here is a new problem.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER], a little while ago, wanted to know if I expected this bill to pass in another body. I said the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has declared that a general revision is intended, and now I raise the question whether, having made an attempt to reduce the duty on the products of the manufacturer, the Democratic Party proposes to reduce the duty on those commodities and materials which the manufacturer must necessarily use in his business? Are you going to cut him down and leave his working materials at the present rate?

WILL ATTEMPTS AT REVISION CONTINUE?

I am putting to you a question that does test the sincerity of the gentlemen on the other side. If the manufacturer is denied protection, will the duties be removed from machinery, chemicals, oils, soaps, and dyestuffs that he uses in his business? He buys much of his machinery from abroad. He buys oils and dyestuffs in large quantities. If he is denied protection for those things he manufactures, will the duties be removed from these adjuncts to his business? Or is it the purpose of this bill to pick him out and make him the victim of a free-trade or tariff-for-revenue policy, while the barriers stand against everything he purchases?

Now, if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] wants to tell the position of the Democratic Party on this question, I think the country would like to be informed, because there are men engaged in these lines of business who are disturbed and will undoubtedly continue to be disturbed as announcements come from the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. Does your party propose to revise these other schedules when you get through with this one?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; with pleasure.

MR. UNDERWOOD SAYS YES.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I was not present when the colloquy which the gentleman refers to occurred. I would not stop to ask the gentleman a question, because the announcement of the Democratic Party on the tariff has been so thorough and so well understood that the question which the gentleman asked is almost an absurdity, as it seems to me. We have announced that we intend to revise this tariff from top to bottom. The only thing that will stop us from revising it from top to bottom is the Republican Senate and the Republican President. If they stop it, we will make an appeal to the country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to thank the gentleman for his frankness, and I desire to confirm his statement that he was not present when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] repeatedly asked me to say whether I expected this bill to pass the Senate. I asked the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] if it was not the Democratic policy, as announced by the gentleman from Alabama, the leader on that side of the House, to press not only this bill but other tariff-revision bills all along the line, so that every industry of the country would be affected by this sort of tinkering. I said I did not question the sincerity of the gentleman from Alabama, and I had to repeat it many times in response to inquiries by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER]. I think it will be remembered that I treated the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], with all fairness in his absence, and wanted it understood that I took him at his word, because I believe him to be a man of his word, and I believe the industries of this country must, as a result of his word, be put upon their guard.

MR. FOWLER COMES BACK.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I do.

Mr. FOWLER. Did I not say that it was the intent of the Democrats in this House to pass this bill, and that we would pass it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I did not understand you to say that in those words, because you were endeavoring to find out whether I believed your party was sincere, and I did not know whether you were speaking by authority of the Democratic caucus; but I undertook to make it plain that I accepted the edict of your caucus; I believed that you meant what you said.

Mr. FOWLER. Is it not a fact that you charged that it was a hypocritical pretense of reducing the tariff?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. FOWLER. Not in so many words; but was not that the idea?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The language used by the gentleman was not used by me. Our colloquy was pleasant, but direct, as I recall it.

A QUESTION OF SINCERITY.

Mr. FOWLER. I repeat, is it not a fact that I said to you that the Democrats in this House expected to pass this bill?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; but I did not quite understand that you had authority, in the absence of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to speak for the Democrats, and that is the reason I was trying to find out whether you were sincere in endeavoring to pass a bill of such momentous importance to the country.

Mr. FOWLER. Was I not inquiring of you as to whether you were sincere in saying that the business of this country will be depressed because we were trying to pass a legitimate tariff bill?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I said that in the introduction of this bill you greatly depressed the business of the country, particularly in the textile industries. I repeat that statement now. And I believe, if you persist in endeavoring to pass this kind of legislation, you will ultimately bring disaster in industrial circles throughout the country.

Mr. FOWLER. And were you not forced to say that the principal places where those industries were oppressed and depressed were where they had been in that condition for years in the past?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. FOWLER. Is not that a fact?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think that question was raised by my Democratic colleague [Mr. DONOHOE] of Pennsylvania, and I recall having said that while there had been depression in the past, there has been no depression like unto this since the days of the Wilson-Gorman tariff bill, when the people in the district of my Democratic colleague and the people of the district which I represent walked the streets of Philadelphia without work, and were applicants at the soup houses, many of them, for the means of sustenance.

THE PANIC OF 1907.

Mr. FOWLER. How was that, my friend, in your city in the year 1907?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not recall that that was a tariff year. There was no tariff agitation in 1907.

Mr. FOWLER. That is correct, but it was a panic year, though.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That may have been.

Mr. FOWLER. And you are comparing the panic years of the nineties with the good times that prevailed in other years, when you know as a matter of fact that every time a panic comes everything falls under the weight of the panic.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know that always happens under Democratic auspices, to answer the gentleman plainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Give me three minutes to finish.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman three minutes out of the time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for three minutes more.

THE BILL MENACES CAPITAL AND LABOR.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The effect of this bill is to take away from the manufacturer such support as he has and to leave his working materials high in the air, costing the same old prices. Altogether, it seems to me that no bill that has been brought into this House since I have been a Member of it, not excepting the reciprocity bill, and its unhappy counterpart, the farmers' free-list bill, has been so fraught with misgivings and uncertainties as is this proposed revision of the woolen schedule. It menaces the employment of more than 168,000 men and women employed, in 1909, in 913 establishments, at better wages than are paid in any other country in the world. It threatens capital invested in these establishments to an amount exceeding $415,000,000. (Census of 1909.) It threatens to drive much of that capital into foreign countries by the simple process of encouraging foreign industry over American industry. For these reasons I am opposed to the bill and hope it will not pass. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Ironworkers, per hour	.131	.525	300

The foregoing are exact figures obtained at date hereof from very prominent American and German mill contractors and constructors.

B. MACHINERY.

Imported machinery pays 45 per cent duty, and the packing, forwarding, and freight charges amount to from 10 to 15 per cent additional.

As outlined in the foregoing statement, domestic machinery used in woolen and worsted manufacturing is not quite so expensive as European machinery, but in many cases the domestic machinery has not been so fully perfected as the European machinery, and is therefore less effective, and this fact tends to neutralize the difference in cost.

From the foregoing figures, compiled under A and B, it can be seen that the cost of a mill in the United States is 55 per cent higher than that of a mill of equal capacity in Germany; and the German figures may well be taken as an average for European countries in general.

Comparative wages paid in woolen and worsted mills in the eastern part of the United States and in Germany.

The above figures are based on the following conditions: Throughout Germany experienced, skilled labor is generally available for all positions in woolen and worsted mills. In America skilled labor must of course be used for the more important positions, while in very many American woolen centers the ordinary operatives are mostly drawn from what is absolutely unskilled labor and are on the whole inexperienced and consequently much less efficient than in Germany. For this reason more people are necessary to do the same amount of work, consequently requiring more foremen to oversee the work of a given number of operatives. The wages given for the United States in the above tables are furnished by mills having mostly unskilled labor, and while they show that the average wages paid in American woolen and worsted mills for the various occupations, compared with those paid by mills of the same capacity in Germany, are in the ratio of 224.92:100, it will also be seen therefrom that the excess paid in the United States to overseers, assistant overseers, and those doing more important work necessitating special skill and judgment is considerably above this average. If there were employed in the American mills by which the above figures have been furnished ordinary operatives equally as skilled as those employed in the German mills on whose wage lists the above absolutely correct figures are based, then the difference between the wages quoted for ordinary operatives in the United States and in Germany would be much greater and the ratio above given would be considerably higher.

COMPARISON OF WAGES AND LIVING CONDITIONS IN UNITED STATES AND ENGLAND.

[Letter of Mr. Harrison Benn, of England and America, dated Beckside Mills, Great Norton, Bradford.]

In order to put before the public a correct statement of the comparative cost of living, together with the wages paid in England and America, it is advisable to have as near as possible the same conditions, both as to locality and the quality of work. As chairman of a company with mills in Clayton and Bradford and president of a corporation with mills in Greystone, near Providence, R. I., America, I am in a practical position to weigh the advantages and disadvantages of free trade and protection.

The English and American mills comb, spin, and weave exactly the same classes of wool, alpaca, and mohair, and the same qualities of yarns and cloth are interchangeable. The machinery in all the mills are identically the same. Many of the work people at Greystone worked in our Bradford mills. At Clayton and Greystone are cooperative stores managed entirely by the workingmen, and it would be very difficult, if not impossible, to obtain fairer conditions for comparing the cost of living in the two countries.

A great amount of discussion is now being carried on regarding the prices of the "food of the people," and in order that every family can ascertain the difference in the cost of living between free-trade England and protectionist America, I give below a list of prices of some "everyday necessary articles of food." The Greystone price list is dated December 10, 1909, and signed by the secretary of the cooperative stores, and the Clayton price list is of a more recent date. For convenience and simplicity I have translated the American "cent" as being equal to 1 halfpenny.

ENGLAND AND RHODE ISLAND COMPARED.

A Bradford butcher employed by the Greystone cooperative states the joints are not cut the same, but the prices realized for the whole animal are just about the same as in England.

Although coal is dearer, I question if the fuel cost per family for 12 months is as much as in England, owing to the general use of slow-combustion stoves.

I have ascertained the quantities of the above-named "everyday necessary articles of food" consumed by families, ranging from 2 to 13 persons, and find the average cost to each Greystonian is 3¾d. per week more than the Claytonian. A family of 5 persons will jointly have to earn 1s. 6¾d. more per week to be equal to a Claytonian.

Having arrived at the cost of living as shown above, I give below the wages paid at Clayton and Bradford for 55½ hours per week and at Greystone for 56 hours.

SUMMARIZED STATEMENT BY LONDON TIMES OF BRITISH BOARD OF TRADE REPORT ON COMPARATIVE WAGE AND LIVING CONDITIONS.

There has just been issued by the board of trade an exhaustive report upon an inquiry made regarding rents and the prices of the necessaries of life and the rates of wages prevailing in the principal industrial towns of the United States. The report itself is prefaced by a summary by Mr. G. R. Askwith, in which it is pointed out that in the towns investigated the rent levels vary greatly, but the New York level on the whole exceeds that of the other towns to a far less extent than the London level exceeds that of the English provincial towns. It appears that the ratio of weekly wages for certain occupations in the United States and England and Wales, respectively, is 243 to 100 in the building trades, 213 to 100 in the engineering trades, 246 to 100 in the printing trades, and 232 to 100 in all the trades together. Allowing for a slight advance in wages in England between October, 1905, when the English figures were taken, and February, 1909, when the American figures were taken, the ratio is reduced to 230 to 100.

The weekly hours of labor were found to be 11 per cent shorter in the building trades in the United States than in England and Wales, and 7 per cent shorter in the printing trades, but 6 per cent longer in the engineering trades, the ratio in all occupations being 96 to 100.

As regards rents, the American workman pays on the whole a little more than twice as much as the English workman for the same amount of house accommodation, the actual ratio being 207 to 100, the minimum of the predominant range of rents for the United States towns as a whole exceeding by from 50 to 77 per cent the maximum of the range for towns in England and Wales for dwellings containing the same number of rooms.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS OF SAMUEL GOMPERS, PRESIDENT OF THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR, REFERRING TO HOUSING CONDITIONS ABROAD.

The housing of the wageworkers of the various European countries as compared with that of the same class in America would, in order to bring out the full truth, require a long and faithful study. When the facts were ascertained the real point remaining would be how to present them in order to create an exact impression of the truth. Besides, in making comparisons, a difficulty would be in fixing an American standard. Conditions exist in a few American cities, such as New York and Pittsburg, representing neither European nor American standards, but what are created through the transition of the most helpless of our newly arrived immigrants from a state, perhaps, more miserable than that in which they lived in their native countries to a level equal to the financially lowest that is permanent among the American-born citizens. Looking at the housing problem wisely, the greatest fact in favor of America is space. The workingman in the country towns and in the cities smaller than those in which the foreign population is congested can rent or perhaps buy a separate home. In general, Europe does not give this opportunity. For example, Bremen is the only considerable city in Germany which has small single-family houses adapted to the needs of working people. Only the big tenement house, except in rare cases, is to be found in other cities. The wage earner in them is regarded as permanently a rent payer, an animal in a stall in a five, six, or seven story stable. No; not one animal in one stall—not so good as that—whole families or a herd of lodgers live in one of the stalls.

* * * * * * *

In no city in Europe did I find rents any cheaper, wages considered, than they run in Philadelphia, Baltimore, Louisville, or in the New England towns not having a boom, or even in many cities of the Mississippi Basin. What strikes the American is how little the European renting wageworker gets for his money. Very seldom indeed has he a bit of garden; he takes a poor water service for granted; his rooms are fewer and smaller than is ordinarily the case of an American house. The rent payer is usually a rent payer for life. No institution of the proportion of the American building and loan association exists in any European country. The movement of large masses from the position of rent payers to that of householders has been characteristic of America. European philanthropists, statesmen, and cooperators are at the present time endeavoring to establish the necessary methods to bring about the same results.

* * * * * * * *

The European working classes, however, neither hire servants nor buy articles of luxury except in rare cases. The struggle for a barely decent living is ever before them. Their necessary annual family "budget" comprises plain and cheap food, which, on the average, takes 40 to 65 per cent of the entire outlay, quarters in either an "industrial" or "slum" district requiring 20 to 35 per cent, and clothing 10 per cent or more. These percentages must be indefinite, depending as they do upon the size of the family, on earnings, and on climate, and even the government. Mentally contemplating the many cities I visited and, having in mind the conversations I had with workingmen who had lived both in Europe and America, I believe I may assert that whether the cost of living in Europe or America is greater to the workingman depends entirely on the standard of living he adopts while in America. If he voluntarily lives the life of self-denial in this country that he compulsorily lived in his native land, his outlay of money will remain about the same. Even then he will hardly be able to escape gaining something from the superior supply of the good things in life in America.

If I am called on to name one of the good things which is conspicuous, I reply: "Our common schools for the workers' children," and as I write the words I hear again the enthusiastic sentiments on this point uttered in my presence by Italians, Bohemians, Austrians, and Irishmen. "To think," they say, "your country gives even the schoolbooks free."

Living is cheap to the wageworker in Europe only because he does without what in America soon becomes a necessity to him—food in good quantity and quality, presentable clothes among his aspiring fellow workmen and their families, and a comfortably furnished home in quarters responding to his awakened desires for equality with his American neighbors, and in general a larger and freer life.

HULTON DYEING & FINISHING CO. (INC.),
Philadelphia, June 13, 1911.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: We beg to call your attention to the inclosed circular advertising coat and trousers for $30. The cloth is attached to the circular, and it will take 3 yards to make this two-piece suit, at a cost of $1.25 per yard, or a total cost of $3.75 for the outside material. At the advertised price of $30 who gets the rest?

We desire to draw your attention to the amount the dyer of the stock and the finisher of the cloth gets in this $30 suit. The dyer receives 11 cents and the finisher 12 cents, these amounts to be deducted from the $3.75 it takes to furnish material for this $30 suit.

The writer feels that if your brother Congressmen would get better acquainted with these conditions they would not be long getting down to something stable and give us some standard to work from.

Yours, truly,

HULTON DYEING & FINISHING CO. (INC.),
JAMES HULTON, President.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11019) to reduce the duties on wool and manufactures of wool, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then on motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow, Thursday, June 15, 1911.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. KALANIANAOLE: A bill (H. R. 11611) to authorize the Territory of Hawaii to guarantee the interest on railway construction bonds; to the Committee on the Territories.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11612) to establish a national park in the Territory of Hawaii; to the Committee on the Territories.

Also, a bill (H. R. 11613) to promote Caucasian immigration to the Territory of Hawaii; to the Committee on the Territories.
